Operation Uhud is also aimed at chasing Polisario guerrillas into Algeria, in a move similar to that of Zimbabwe Rhodesia, who also chase Patriotic Front guerrillas into Zambia and Mozambique.

DEATH SENTENCE FOR ANC GUERRILLA James Mange, one of 12 defendeants in a trial for treason in Pietermaritzburg, South Africa, was sentenced to death last month, while 11 others received long prison terms. All were given an additional year in prison for contempt of court, as they refused to take part in trial proceedings, singing African nationalist songs from the special glass-enclosed dock where they were confined in the courtroom. The defendants were not charged with killings, nor with acting together as a group, but with participating in a plot to overthrow the government by force, and with undergong guerrilla training abroad under the auspies of the banned African National Congress (ANC). Mange was apparently singled out for the death penalty because of his leadership role in the protests in court.

MORE POLITICAL SHIFTS IN UGANDA Once again the Ugandan head of state has angered the ruling National Consultative Council (NCC) by making unilateral cabinet changes. On November 19, President Godfrey Binaisa moved Yoweri Museveni from defense to the Ministry of Regional Cooperation without the required four day notice to the NCC. When Binaisa's predecessor, Yusufu Lule, remodeled his cabinet without consulting the Council, he was removed.

While it may not cost him his post, Binaisa's move seems aimed at increasing his influence at the expense of the more left-leaning politicians who include Museveni. This in turn might assist Binaisa in his effort to attract additional Western aid.

Museveni, who advocates policies like those of Tanzania or Mozambique, played a mojor role in the war against Amin and reportedly enjoys considerable support within the armed forces. Binaisa has assumed the defense ministry himself.

PUERTO RICO

NAVY AMBUSHED

The ambush attack on a United States Navy bus in Puerto Rico should not have come as a surprise.

That, at least, is the view of many political observers on the Caribbean island, who note that independence groups taking credit for the attack Dec. 3 have been threatening such incidents for several months.

Moreover, the ambush took place two months after pro-independence terrorists attacked a bar frequented by Navy personnel outside the main gate of the Roosevelt Roads Naval Reservation in eastern Puerto Rico.

The Navy apparently has been singled out by pro-independence elements on the island because of its use of the small offshore island of Vieques for bombing practice. The bombing has long rankled Puerto Ricans, and successive island governments have sought to end Vieques's use by the Navy.

The ambush of the Navy bus, in which two sailors were killed and 10 others injured, took place just before 7 a.m. on a lonely highway near the Sabana Seca naval communications center west of San Juan, the Puerto Rican capital. The bus riders were Navy personnel, men and women, on their way to work.

Accounts of the incident vary in details, but it is clear that the attackers were hidden in a white van parked alongside the road and that they pumped close to 50 shots into the bus before fleeing in the van, which was later found abandoned in San Juan. Soon after the incident, three nationalist groups claimed joint responsibility for the attack and declared themselves at war with "Yankee imperialism."

The three are the Volunteers of the Puerto Rican Revolution; the Boricua Popular Army, also known as the Macheteros; and the Armed Forces of Popular Resistance. The groups, which are thought to be relatively small in number, want independence for Puerto Rico. The island became a US possession in 1898 and since 1948 has been a commonwealth, linked to the US as a free state.

In their statement, the three groups allude to the deaths of independence activists, one of whom was found hanged in a Florida prison last month. He had been convicted of trespassing on beaches used for target practice on the offshore island of Vieques.

The ambush was the first fatal attack on military personnel by terrorists on Puerto Rico since 1970. But it clearly fit into the announced action plan of the three pro-independence groups.

Other pro-independence groups on the island condemned the attack but noted that they are determined to push their cause and that they hold the US responsible for "imperialist actions" on the island. Pro-independence parties have gained about 6 percent of voter support in recent elections.

But Puerto Rican Gov. Carlos Romero Barceló, who favors statehood for the island, said he was horrified by the incident and ordered police and other security units to probe the case. President Carter ordered the Federal Bureau of Investigation to join in the probe.

Some observers in Puerto Rico, in the wake of the incident, said it was likely to turn many islanders away from the independence cause, since Puerto Ricans basically are a people who favor peaceful means of achieving change.

This possibility obviously worried the Puerto Rican Independence Party, which immediately issued a statement saying it was not involved in the incident but urged Puerto Ricans to rally around the independence cause "so that we can put an end to the United States occupation of the island."

MEXICO

SHAH REJECTED

Deep concern over the possibility of Muslim attacks on Mexican embassies and facilities around the world led to Mexico's surprise decision last week to close its borders to the Shah of Iran.

Moreover, Mexico reasoned that taking the Shah back would not in any way help the US hostages in Tehran and therefore it saw no particular reason for extending the Shah's visa.

President Jose Lopez Portillo states that he has no wish to embroil his country in "a conflict which is not ours."

But some sources close to the government in Mexico say that the refusal to permit the Shah to return to Mexico is also evidence of Mexican pique at not being included in US discussions on how to deal with the Shah.

"Had we been brought into the planning on what to do with the Shah," a highly placed Mexican observer said, "we might well have been able to work something out. But Washington just thought all along we would take the Shah off its hands and that would be that."

President Lopez Portillo was also highly critical of President Carter's "precipitious decision" to freeze Iran's assets in the United States.

Mexico, which played host to the Shah for 123 days earlier this year in line with its traditional support of the right to asylum, did inform the US of its decision not to readmit the Shah before it was announced publicly. But State Department spokesmen say that they had no advance inkling that Mexico would bar the Shah's return until Mexico conveyed the word.

NICARAGUA– HONDURAS

RELATIONS RESTRAINED

Nicaragua has recalled its ambassador to protest provocations by the right-wing neighboring Honduran government.

The recall of ambassador Ricardo Wheelock in mid-November followed several incidents of harassment and threats against the Nicaraguan envoy, as well as a violation of Nicaragua's air space by Honduran jets. Less than two week later, on Nov. 20, two Nicaraguan diplomats were arrested in Tegucipalpa by Honduran authorities.

In one incident, Wheelock was accused by Honduran police of stealing a car; in another, Honduran military intelligence forces encircled the Nicaraguan embassy. The three jets flew over Nicaragua after two Nicaraguan soldiers were held by Honduran police for accidentally straying across the border, an incident for which the Managua government apologized. Meanwhile, Nicaragua has charged Honduras' military attache in Managua of conspiring against the popular government.

While Nicaragua hopes the current squabble will be "transitory" and that trade relations with Honduras will not be affected, the recent disputes appear to be linked to the Honduran government's fundamental hostility to the Nicaraguan revolution, which it shares with the other rightest regimes in the region—Guatemala and El Salvador. Some reports suggest military leaders of the three countries may be planning a conscious policy aimed at isolating Nicaragua economically.

ARGENTINA

FREE PRESS SETBACK

Freedom of the press in Argentina has suffered yet another setback as the editor of the crusading English-language Buenos Aires Herald flees the country following threats against him and his family.

Robert Cox, an Englishman whose 10-year tenure as editor has been marked by growing esteem for the 100-year-old paper, announced Dec. 4 that he sees no other course but to leave.

He cited a letter sent to his 10-year-old son, Peter, allegedly signed by the leftist Montonero guerrillas, suggesting the family leave because of the risk of being murdered by the government of Gen. Jorge Rafael Videla.

"The letter purported to be from the Montoneros, but I am convinced it is phony," Mr. Cox said. "This was only the last in a series of threatening phone calls to the Herald, strange visits to my home, and calls to friends."

Ironically, General Videla has been considered one of Mr. Cox's most ardent defenders. Two years ago, after military police picked him up and put him in jail, a judge held a special Saturday hearing to have him released – an action in which General Videla's hand was seen. Then, last October, Mr. Cox hurriedly fled Argentina after the British Embassy learned of threats against him. He returned within a week when General Videla gave assurances that he would not be harmed.

Buenos Aires sources said that while General Videla had a high regard for both Mr. Cox and the Herald, other military leaders "were out to get Cox" and that "they would stop at nothing in the effort."

The Herald, with a circulation of only 17,000 daily, has a long and solid reputation of crusading journalism dating back to the 1940s, when editor Norman Ingrey, also an Englishman, fought the Perón dictatorship. He received a Maria Moors Cabot citation from Columbia University for this role – a prize that Mr. Cox also received in 1978 for his support of human rights and condemnation of guerrilla violence.

Guatemalan union leaders in peril, Amnesty warns

London

Amnesty International charged Wednesday that leading trade unionists in Guatemala were in danger of being murdered. The London-based human rights organization said in a report sent to the Guatemalan Government that "to be a union leader or active member of a trade union in Guatemala today means risking one's life." Amnesty International estimated that more than 2,000 people have been killed for political reasons during the past 18 months there.

BOLIVIA

Bolivia's Army feuds over new commander in chief

Bolivia is again teetering on the brink of political crisis.

Just a week after coming to office, President Lidia Gueiler Tejada is locked in a test of wills with Gen. Luis García Meza, the Army commander in chief, who refuses to step down.

President Gueiler has named Gen. René Villarroel Rejas to the post – and Bolivia, as a result, has two men claiming to be head of the Army.

Each has taken up his separate command post and is trying to line up support from military units around the country. General García has been able to win the allegiance of the important Tarapaca Barracks near La Paz, the capital, but other units in the La Paz area are supporting General Villarroel.

This sort of test of wills is nothing new in Bolivia, where the military frequently quarrels within its own ranks. But in this case, it threatens President Gueiler's fragile civiliangovernment.

Although she came to power with the support of the military, along with that of an overwhelming majority of civilian politicians and labor leaders, the chronically unstable nature of Bolivian government does not augur well for her ability to govern and remain in power.

At the same time, many Bolivians are increasingly unhappy about the image their nation presents – that of a country where the military has overthrown numerous governments on what one military commander said recently "are little more than whims." Personal ambition on the part of military men also have played a role.

In the present situation, the desire of ousted military leader Col. Alberto Natusch Busch to continue exerting his influence appears to be a major factor.

The colonel seized power Nov. 1 in a coup that did not have much support from the Army; but just before stepping down in favor of President Gueiler, he named General García, one of his supporters, as the Army commander.

It is traditional, however, for new presidents to name their own armed forces commanders – and that is exactly what President Gueiler did in choosing General Villarroel, as well as new commanders for both the Navy and the Air Force.

President Gueiler had no trouble with her choices for the Navy and Air Force posts. But the Army, the senior service, is proving to be a different story.

Her choice of General Villarroel did not set well with either General García, who has had little time to exercise his authority, or Colonel Natusch Busch, who is currently staying at his large cattle ranch in the northeast jungles of Beni Province.

General García, who has long feuded with General Villarroel, said of him Nov. 24: "He is not my choice and I will not obey him."

For his part, Colonel Natusch Busch appears to regard his current retirement as temporary, having told his fellow Army commanders on departing office Nov 16, "I will be back. Someone has to control the subversives and enemies of the military."

BOLIVIA

MORE PROBLEMS FOR LYDIA

Just a week after civilian rule was restored in Bolivia, another general decided that the country couldn't do without his leadership, and staged a temporary rebellion. While the constitutional government is still in power, the revolt was one more indication of the frailty of democracy in Bolivia.

Gen. Luis Garcia Merza on Nov. 23 refused orders by new President Lydia Gueiler Tejada to step down as army commander. The general placed his troops on alert at army headquarters, two miles from the presidential palace. Garcia claimed that his rebellion was "not directed against the constitutional government," but was opposed to the new defense minister and other military commanders appointed by Gueiler in an armed forces leadership shakeup last week.

Without elaborating, Garcia charged the government had "failed to keep its word," in the agreement between military and civilian leaders that allowed congressionally elected Gueiler to replace Col. Alberto Nantusch. Nantusch's bloody 16-day attempt to seize power had been defeated by massive popular opposition, forcing the generals to compromise with congressional and labor leaders. Under the agreement, half of Gueiler's cabinet is to come from the military.

Gueiler had announced the change in top military leadership as a move to depoliticize the armed forces. One day after reiterating her commitment to constitutional rule and warning that she would invoke military sanctions against rebellious officers, Gueiler conceded to Garcia's main demand and named Gen. Ruben Rocha Patino as army commander in the place of her original appointment, Gen. Villaroel Rejas. It then appeared that the crisis had been resolved—for the time being.

PUERTO RICAN PRISIONER OF WAR ASSASSINATED BY US GOVERNMENT

SLIDES: THE HISTORICAL AND PRESENT STRUGGLE FOR PUERTO RICAN INDEPENDENCE FOCUS ON VIEQUES

SPEAKER: NEW MOVEMENT IN SOLIDARITY WITH PUERTO RICAN INDEPENDENCE

On November 11, Angel Rodriguez Cristóbal, member of the Central Committee and Political Commission of the Puerto Rican Socialist League, was assassinated by the U.S. government while held Prisoner of War in Federal Prison in Tallahassee, Fla. Angel Rodríguez Cristóbal was captured by the U.S. military and tried by a U.S. colonial court in reprisal for his participation in a protest in May, against the presence of U.S. armed forces in Vieques. He was a soldier captured in the war against imperialism. He demanded that he be recognized as a Prisoner of War. For this he was assassinated...in an attempt to terrorice the people, to draw out and destroy the armed clandestine movement and to prevent the escallation of Peoples War.

Since World War II, Roosevelt Roads Naval Base has been a key part of imperialism's strategy to defeat struggles for national liberation in Puerto Rico, throughout the Caribean and Latin America. Vieques is militarily occupied by this base; 1/3 of the land is used for military maneuvers to insure the speedy launching of U.S. troops against national liberation wars. Driven off their land, subject to indiscriminate bombing raids, their fishing waters destroyed, the people are faced with the recent statement of the Secretary of the Navy, that the U.S. will never leave Vieques.

The May protest changed the direction of the mass struggle against the Navy and imperialism. The Fuerzas Armadas de Liberación Nacional (FALN) and the armed clandestine movement on the Island have fought for 15 years to defeat reformism in the Independence and solidarity movements by waging armed struggle against imperialism. Under that leadership, Angel was building a mass anti-imperialist movement throughout the Island of Puerto Rico that has taken the war against imperialism from the courts to the streets and beaches, waging Peoples War for independence and socialism.

The reformists havecalled upon the Federal Government, which Angel did not recognize and died fighting to destroy, to investigate his execution. But the people have done their investigation. The LSP and the clandestine movement has vowed to avenge his murder by driving the U.S military our of Puerto Rico. We condemn the U.S. govennment for these acts of war. We celebrate the victorious escape of William Guillermo Morales and the freedom of the four Puerto Rican Nationalist Prisoners of War, Lolita Libron, Oscar Collazo, Rafael Cancel Miranda, and Irvin Flores. We commit ourselves to build a solidarity movement to free Pablo Marcano Garcia and Nydia Cuevas, currently held Prisoners of War in U.S. prisons; to free the Vieques 4 and to drive the military out of Puerto Rico by intensifying the struggle against the U.S. Navy inside the U.S. JOIN US -- by American Friends Service Committee.

CAMBODIA: causes of the calamity

EQUALITY UNITY

Cambodia today is a man made disaster. Recalling its origins may point the way to a solution.

War (1969-1975)

For years Cambodia under Prince Sihanouk maintained an uneasy neutrality towards the war raging in Vietnam.

By 1967, Vietnamese revolutionaries, responding to massive U.S. intervention in their country, had moved into eastern Camodia and established base areas. In 1969 President Nixon and Secretary of State Kissinger ordered them "secretly" bombed.

The 1970 overthrow of Sihanouk by the U.S. backed General Lon Nol thrust Cambodia totally into the war. The until—then marginal Khmer Rouge led by Pol Pot allied itself with Sihanouk and became a rallying point for nationalist opposition.

In April 1970 American and South Vietnamese armies, supported by massive air strikes, carried out a full—scale invasion of Cambodia. When the January 1973 Paris Peace Agreement ended the bombing of Vietnam, U.S. B52s were retargeted on Cambodia.

By the time the U.S. Congress barred bombing in August 1973, U.S. planes had dropped on Cambodia three and a half times the tonnage dropped on Japan in World War II. This war killed an estimated 800,000 people (10 percent of the population), rendered a third of the population refugees, and destroyed most rice paddies.

the Pol Pot Era 1975– 1978

After the Khmer Rouge Victory in April 1975, conceivably the most drastic social revolution in human history began. In a draconian effort to solve food shortages, establish political control, and purge Cambodia of all modern western and colonial influences, the new government forced people to leave the cities. A blood letting ensued, which, combined with hunger and disease, took an estimated two million or more lives.

The nation's infrastructure of social, medical, economic and educational servic3s was destroyed. With few exceptions, professional people reportedly hid their identities while working in the fields or were killed.

Through despotic mobilization of the whole society, Pol Pot reportedly did restore agricultural production, though individual farmer's rice rations were generally inadequate. In the autumn of 1978, Cambodia as well as Vietnam suffered the worst floods of four decades. They destroyed much of the rice crop.

War Again 1978- ? For centuries, borders shifted and conflicts erupted between Vietnam, China, Thailand, Cambodia and Laos.

Following months of border warfare, usuallly initiated by Pol Pot's troops, Vietnam invaded Cambodia in December of 1978. Its forces supported the soldiers of Heng Samrin recruited from the 400,000 Cambodians who had fled into Vietnam.

Many countries criticized the Vietnamese invasion. Others condoned it, likening the situation to Tanzania's invasion of Uganda and overthrow of Idi Amin.

AFSC opposed the invasion, urged a negotiated political solution and the replacement of all foreign troops (including Chinese advisors) with an international peace keeping force.

The forces of Vietnam and Heng Samrin, with military supplies from the Soviet Union, quickly established control over most of Cambodia. China, Pol Pot's principal ally, continued to provide weapons and other support, encouraging him to wage a guerilla struggle for 10 to 20 years if necessary. China also invaded Vietnam as a "punishment."

Thailand is cooperating with Chinese efforts to resupply Pol Pot's guerillas. The Thai military also encouraged the establishment of border enclaves controlled by armed, right—wing Cambodian groups linked previously to the U.S. CIA and America's former ally, Lon Nol.

During the current dry season, Heng Samrin, supported by Hanoi's troops, is attempting to consolidate control of Cambodia by destroying the remaining forces of Pol Pot and other hostile groups. As the fighting moves closer to the Thai border, tens of thousands of starving civilians are fleeing across it The anti—Heng Samrin soldiers, who often appear better fed than other refugees, commonly return to Cambodia after being resupplied.

Some of the food shortages in Cambodia today, and the political difficulties in shipping in food to contested border areas, can be ascribed to the fighting. Control over food is a factor in the military conflict for all combatants— and their foreign backers.

But more crucial for the danger of country—wide famine was the failure to plant 85—95 percent of rice and other crops in June and July. Freed of Khmer Rouge control, millions of Cambodians abandoned the fields they had been forced into and began long treks home or in search of family members.

Though the threat of famine in Cambodia has been known since March, significant Western aid did not begin to arrive until October. The principal impediment appears to have been disagreement about the means of distribution.

China the U.S. and some major Western donor countries opposed accepting the new government of the People's Republic of Kampuchea led by Heng Samrin. They pressed for the distribution of food within Cambodia by international agencies, insisting Heng Samrin's administration was incapable of handling the job, or would divert food to soldiers. Presumably they also did not want Heng Samrin to gain credibility with his own people by providing food.

These same countries, including the U.S., successfully argued at the U.N. in September that the deposed Pol Pot regime was legally entitled to occupy Cambodia's seat.

The government in Phnom Penh greeted with suspicion the West's distribution and monitoring demands. It saw these demands as 'political conditions' by governments which were diplomatically hostile to its existence, and even tacitly supporting China's military resupply of its opponents.

Officials in Phnom Penh, struggling to create a national government and ministries, probably also saw the prospect of large numbers of disaster relief foreigners, even if well meaning, as a threat to their vulnerable sovereignty.

The compromise reached in October provided that the Phnom Penh government distribute food under close monitoring by international agencies in order to insure aid goes only to civilians in need.

Food distribution to Cambodians in Thailand and on the border is controlled by the Thai military which is reported to give priority to supplying forces fighting Heng Samrin and the Vietnamese. U.S. government donated food delivered by voluntary agency 'mercy convoys' has been left on the border to be picked up by civilians and military alike.

a Solution

Stability in Southeast Asia is unlikely as long as there are large numbers of Vietnamese troops in Cambodia. Howeve, neither Phnom Penh nor Hanoi are likely to accept Vietnamese withdrawal until the threat from Pol Pot or another Chinese ally is removed politically or militarily.

Many Americans might prefer to forget the awful impact of the long U.S. war in Indochina on the people of the region, (or, for that matter, on Americans, particularly veterans.)

But it is a fact that our military actions contributed to the current tragedy. We dropped on three small Impoverished countries seven times the tonnage of explosives the Allies used in all theaters of World War II. In contrast to other twentieth century wars, the U.S. withheld postwar aid to Indochina.

When the U.S. ended its direct and indirect military role in 1975, the sudden termination of U.S. aid, food and subsidies exacerbated Indochina's profound economic, social, poplitical and ecological problems.

Many observers believe that had the U.S. dealt humanely with the aftermath of the war, some of the problems underlying inter—state relations would have been far less acute.

Even at this late date a more positive U.S. policy including diplomatic recognition, trade and reconstruction aid will contribute to peace and stability in Indochina and help Cambodia.

COMMENTARIES

The tragic plight of the Cambodians need no further words. Peoples from all around the world have responded with money, food and medical supplies. Recently at Smith College, nearly 2,000 atudents, 84 percent of the school's population fasted a meal to aid the Cambodians. A few weeks ago at U.Mass, over 4,000 students fasted their dinners thus, providing thousands of more dollars to the Cambodian's relief.

In doing this famine relief work, it is also important to insure that the aid actually does end up in the hands of the Cambodian people. So far, much of the aid has not gone to the people but has been sitting in warehouses and even has been diverted to the Vietnamese Army.

At the same time it is important to address the underlying root causes of the famine, that is, the Vietnamese aggression into Cambodia which is fully supported by the Soviet Union.

Not until all foreign forces are withdrawn from Cambodia and the fighting ceases, will the tragedy of the Camdodians come to a halt.

At the Asian American Students Association meeting last Thursday night, a number of us discussed the situation in Iran.

We do not think the idea of taking the Americans as hostages was right but neither do we support any anti—Iranian or anti—foreign sentiments in this country.

We only need to look back 35 years to World War II when person of Japanese ancestory in the United States were evacuated from their homes, in masse and were forced to live in concentration camps. This move was a result of the anti—Japanese feelings that were present because of the United States and Japan's involvement in the war.

Today the U.S. must act wisely and carefully in handling the Iranian crisis. Iranian students in this country should be allowed to pursue the quality educations they seek in a climate free of fear and misunderstanding. We support these students in their efforts.

Why are library bricks loose?

Consultants agree problems exist, but all pinpoint different causes

UMass buildings

What's going wrong

A FIVE PART SERIES

By GARY RANDALL
Collegian Staff

When Physical Plant Director George Norton proposed last spring that $100,000 in excess library funds be used to install a sixth elevator in the University library, he had no idea that five months later administrators would be forced to spend the excess money on consulting firms to investigate a recurring problem of falling brick chips.

While brick chips falling from the library had been a problem since its opening in 1973, there was a period in which no chips fell. But shortly after graduation last May and the annual exodus of students, a library clerk on her way to work one morning counted four brick chips ranging from the size of a nickel to a half-dollar, lying on the ground near the base of the building.

After its completion, the 28-story structure stood like an exclamation point, signalling the end of an era, in which Southwest, Sylvan, the FAC, the pond and Whitmore were built.

Since Loomis and Loomis of Windsor Conn. had been evaluating construction problems on the parking garage from the beginning of the year, Leo Liberman, UMass project engineer asked Loomis to extend its investigation to the brick problem at the library and possibly shed some light on the situation. The result was the closing of the library Aug. 31.

At the beginning

There was good reason for the fanfare which accompanied the laying of the library's corner stone in 1973. It was to be icing on the cake, the university's tour de force. After its completion, the 28-story structure stood like a giant exclamation point, signaling the end of an era in which the Southwest and Sylvan Residential Areas, the Fine Arts Center, the Whitmore Administration building, the Campus Center and the campus pond were built.

When the first chips were discovered on the ground in the fall of 1973, they were regarded with mild curiosity and not much excitement. The building was still under guarantee. Edmund Ryan, of the UMass physical plant sent a letter to the New York architect, Edward Durell Stone, asking him to explore the problem.

"All new buildings experience problems when they are first built," explained Liberman. "Whether its a public building or private building, there's a lot of things that can go wrong."

Liberman said he was responsible for working with the BBC and the construction firm as a liason, providing their on-site needs such as water, security and electricity. "I had no authority," he said. "I just made sure things went smoothly. The BBC was responsible for the actual construction."

On receiving Ryan's letter, stone wrote to C.E. Maguire, the architect's design engineer of the library during its construction. In the letter he asked the firm to investigate the breakage. Maguire's role during the construction of the library was to define the needs of the library in terms of materials used. As the engineers, the firm was responsible for deciding which materials, and what size of materials were strong enough to be used. They also chose the electrical and mechanical materials called for by the architect.

After observing the facade with a transit telescope, Maguire reported to Stone, the BBC, UMass and O'Connell that "The problem is not structural. The pattern of brick break indicates a strong possibility of the omission of weep holes."

Weep holes called for on the blue prints, are holes made by the mason as he construets walls which allow air to circulate behind the facade, drying up moisture that would freeze and crack the bricks if trapped behind the facade. If the weepholes had been omitted, Maguire asserted, it was O'Connell's fault.

A Closer Look

By October 26, O'Connell's workers set up staging and examined the brickwork, which had been constructed during an eight month period, two years before.

"We are sorry that these few bricks got passed us, but we do feel certain we have taken care of the problem," O'Connell wrote to Stone in his report after the investigation. "We will keep checking the building periodically and keep you advised if we find any change."

From the staging, "Connell found that weepholes had been installed, according to plans and that the problem was confined to three areas of the building. A total of four bricks were replaced.

As far as UMass officials were concerned, the problem was resolved—until November, 1975, when a piece of falling brick nearly struck a passerby.

Once again Ryan mailed out letters to Stone, the BBC, and O'Connell. Within a month representatives from those organizations were at UMass for an on-site investigation. In the meantime, a temporary wooden barricade had been constructed around the library's perimeter.

After the inspection, during which a section of the brickwork was open up so that the representatives could see inside, an informal meeting was held in the physical plant. At the meeting, according to a physical plant file, the group agreed that the bricks lying on the horizontal support angle had been saw cut as opposed to preformed as specified by the contract drawings.

Another problem agreed on by the group was that the control joints, spaces between the panels that allowed the bricks to expand in hot weather, had been filled with mortar, keeping the panels from expanding.

But most important, the memo stated, the problem will be a fecurring one if the corrective measures are not taken.

Before adjourning, it was decided that Stone would analyze the problem, and submit a report to the BBC, which would figure the cost and assign a contractor to do the job.

More Chips

After several more incidents of falling bricks, however, UMass officials decided they could not wait for Stone and the BBC to finish their reports. With a telescope, physical plant workers counted 30 defective bricks.

"The situation dictated that we turn to Daniel O'Connell's Sons, the only organization in the area which we feel had the knowledge, equipment and expertise to eliminate the danger," Ryan reported to the UMass administration.

At an estimated cost of $5,000 to $6,000,

Kennedy relative speaks here

Sheila Kennedy, the 30-year-old wife of Joseph P. Kennedy III, presidential hopeful Sen. Edward Kennedy's nephew, last night told a Campus Center audience the senator believes young people are "the country's greatest resource."

Speaking before 50 students, Kennedy said the "tough, familiar problems need to be solved now." These problems, she continued, confront ordinary people "unable to keep up with inflation, to find a job, to afford heat. We are floundering. We need Ted Kennedy to get us back on the track."

Kennedy's record as senator the past 11 years is evidence that he will be able to deal with such issues as hospital costs, helping the poor and elderly, and making a comprehensive energy plan effective, she said.

Following Kennedy's five-minute speech, she answered questions from the audience.

Of the Iranian crisis, she said she cannot speak for "the inner circle of the campaign," yet as the senator has stated, she reiterated that the question of the Shah and the 50 American hostages held in Tehran can be viewed separately. The media "hyped up" the senator's comments on Iran, she said.

"In the long run, the wisdom of what the senator said will be taken under scrutiny and then he'll be shown to be right," she said.

Kennedy said the senator's proposed economic program

Hostage cites good treatment

DENVER (AP) – A 21-yearold Marine corporal told NBC News yesterday that he and 49 other hostages at the U.S. Embassy in Iran are being treated well by their student captors.

Billy Gallegos of Pueblo, Colo., was interviewed in Tehran. The tape was relayed via satellite to the United States where excerpts were televised on the NBC Nightly News. His parents, Dick and Theresa Gallegos, saw the excerpts at KOA-TV studios here.

The couple identified their son from the videotape and from photographs taken at the Tehran taping session earlier in the day.

NBC said it was allowed to interview the hostage on the condition that the entire interview – and a response from an Iranian student – be telecast. NBC said it would telecast the interview and response in full later Monday night.

U.S. missiles allowed overseas

BRUSSELS, Belgium (AP) – U.S. officials have won NATO approval to base hundreds of new nuclear missiles in Western Europe, senior diplomatic sources said yesterday at a conference of alliance foreign and defense ministers.

Official endorsement is expected Wednesday, the third day of the conference, for the controversial plan that has been condemned by the Soviet Union and its Warsaw Pact allies.

Under the plan, 464 Tomahawk cruise and 108 Pershing 2 missiles will be place in European nations belonging to the North Atlantic Treaty Organization.

One purpose is to offset the growing nuclear capability of the Soviet Union, which NATO claims has added 120 SS-20 nuclear-tipped missiles to its armory.

U.S. raps Japan on boycott

PARIS (AP) – The United States accused Japan yesterday of sending "ambiguous signals" to Iran by buying boycotted oil and easing the effects of a freeze on Iranian assets.

The sudden blast against Japan came as Secretary of State Cyrus R. Vance sought support from U.S. allies for strong and united economic retaliation against Iran if spy trials of the U.S. hostages are begun.

One U.S. official suggested that buying boycotted oil and easing an assets squeeze could make it tougher for the hostages now in the 37th day of captivity.

The situation at the seized U.S. Embassy was described as "very delicate" and reporters traveling with Vance on a fastpaced visit to four Western European capitals were told there was "faint hope" the 50 hostages would be freed soon.

Brown raps Kennedy's stand on Iran, oil controls, nukes

By MARGARET NELSON
Associated Press

CONCORD, N.H. – California Gov. Edmund G. Brown Jr. yesterday ripped into Massachusetts Sen. Edward Kennedy's recent statements against the deposed Shah of Iran as "endangering the lives of the American hostages."

"He gave aide and comfort to the Ayatollah (Khomeini) and probably strengthened the stand of the Iranian students holding the hostages," Brown told reporters during a campaign stop in New Hampshire.

Kennedy said last week the Shah had presided over one of the most repressive regimes in history and had plundered Iran.

"You can imagine the effect of that outrageous statement by an American politician when it appeared as a headline in the newspapers in Tehran," Brown said, adding that he believed the statement would lead to Kennedy's rapid decline in the polls.

Brown was in the state seeking support in his bid for the Democratic nomination for president.

He also continued to hammer at Kennedy's 1976 vote for the decontrol of heating oil prices.

"Both Kennedy and Carter have played Santa Claus for the oil companies through policies that have cost the Northeast hundreds of million of dollars in extra charges for heating oil," he said.

Kennedy's campaign officially has objected to Brown's radio campaign ads that characterized Kennedy as serving the oil companies with his vote for decontrol.

Kennedy's staff said that Kennedy was voting for the option of reinstituting controls once the price had been decontrolled.

But Brown said yesterday that Kennedy's staff was misrepresenting the vote.

"Kennedy was warned before he voted that controls would be almost impossible to reimpose, and he has hired the former vice president of Mobile Oil to help with his campaign," he said.

Brown also criticized Carter for "becoming a salesman for the nuclear industry," and said the president was pursuing the wrong course in trying to break the country's dependence on foreign oil.

He called Carter's removal of Joseph Hendrie as head of the Nuclear Regulatory Commission on Friday "rearranging the furniture on the deck of the Titanic."

He advocated instituting a national gas rationing policy to reduce the consumption of oil. Gas rationing would enable Americans to reduce waste in oil consumption and restore the dollar on world markets, he said.

Khomeini blasts Carter, U.S.

By ALEXANDER G. HIGGINS
Associated Press

TEHRAN, Iran – Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini, grappling with the greatest challenge yet to his rule, blamed President Carter yesterday for Iran's internal unrest and advised Americans to vote against the re-election of their "bad president."

Khomeini virtually dared the "brainless" United States to try to organize an international economic embargo against Iran.

The clergyman-revolutionary delivered his blistering attack on Carter as the 50 American Embassy hostages spent their 37th day in captivity. New diplomatic intermediaries were arriving in Tehran, but there was no sign the Iranians were budging from their hard-line stand – the shah for the hostages.

For the first time, American officials indicated they had reason to believe that some of the hostages may have been moved from the embassy to other, unknown locations.

That disclosure came at a hearing of the International Court of Justice in The Hague, where Attorney General Benjamin R. Civiletti appealed for the court to act speedily to end Iran's "barbaric" holding of the hostages "and save human lives."

The Iranians boycotted the court session.

In northwest Iran, meanwhile, a peace mission dispatched by Khomeini's Revolutionary Council arrived in the city of Tabriz, where dissident Iranian Turks battled Sunday and yesterday with pro-Khomeini forces in clashes that left a reported nine Turks dead.

Leaders of the dissidents, who want greater autonomy for their Azerbaijan region, said they would not meet with the Council delegation.

Khomeini's denunciation of Carter came in a speech to Moslem students in his headquarters city of Qom. Two thousand miles away in Western Europe, Secretary of State Cyrus Vance was meeting with British and French leaders to discuss possible new economic pressures on Iran.

Carter says he may seek to halt commerce with Iran if the Khomeini regime puts the hostages on trial as "spies," as it has threatened to do.

"We are not frightened of economic blockades," Khomeini declared. "

Rampersad testimonies inconsistent

Editor's Note: The following is the second installment of a five-part series examining the death of Seta T. Rampersad, a 20-year-old UMass student whose death last year spurred community concern when an inquest concluded no criminal negligence was involved.

This series was compiled by Betty Ciolek, Lee Goodwin, Darlene Lorkiewick, Serena Richard and Robert E. Stein.

The inconsistencies in the testimony taken during the inquest into the death of Seta Rampersad have left those interested in the case baffled as to exactly what happened the night she died.

The number of seizure-like attacks Rampersad had the night of her death, exactly what drugs were taken that night, specific times of key events that evening and a determination of the time of death, are just some of the inconsistencies.

Drugs

Demetrious Konstanlopulos, one of the three people with Rampersad at the Motel 6 hotel room where she died, said "all four" smoked marijuana in "a small pipe" and "there was a little cocaine which I had some and we all had some."

Brian Pitzer, also with Rampersad the night she died, said, however, "Basically the only one that was smoking it was me." He was "not sure if Seta had cocaine."

Carol Newton, the last major witness at the inquest, testified that all four had consumed drugs that night but at one point Rampersad "declined." "She said she had enough," Newton said.

The Third World Women's Task Force and the Committee Against Repression, UMass groups, claim the confusion in the exact number of attacks Rampersad had on the night of her death indicates the inability of the witnesses to clarify for the court exactly what happened.

Konstanlopulos claimed Rampersad had three attacks, whereas Newton's testimony indicates she might have had four.

"After I tried falling asleep I heard Jimmy say to Seta 'What's the matter with you?' and I heard her mumbling something," Newton said.

Konstanlopulos testified the first attack occured when "it was just getting to be light" and Rampersad was "standing up in bed and she was shaking her hands. She did not talk to me but she nodded her head."

Confusing testimony

The testimony becomes confusing and almost contradictory as to when the second attack occurred. During the inquest Konstanlopulos did not mention the incident that Newton described as the second attack.

Newton said she was asleep and Konstanlopulos "rammed his hand up the inside of my thigh...He told me there was something wrong with Seta and I looked over at her and she seemed to be perfectly fine, just resting."

Konstanlopulos was never questioned about this incident.

What Newton described as the next or third seizure-like "attack" and Konstanlopulos described as the second "attack" occured at dawn. Konstanlopulos testified that Rampersad displayed the same symptoms in this instance as in the first attack. This time, however, he said he "awakened the other girl" who "came over. She started talking to her and she checked her pulse." He first said Rampersad did not respond and fell asleep, but later said "she came to, she looked at both of us and she went back to sleep."

"Stiff and shaking"

"Now there was good daylight out and I suggested to the other girl that we go for breakfast and come back and bring some coffee for them," Konstanlopulos continued.

Newton said after Konstanlopulos woke her up, she watched Rampersad for half an hour. She said Rampersad was "stiff and shaking too...the whole thing lasted five or ten minutes...but her whole body shook for ten seconds. She seemed to be choking in a rapid tight breathing sound. Her eyes were opened and they would be closed, her eyes would roll up."

Newton also said Rampersad "did not respond verbally or with her eyes," contradicting Konstanlopulos' testimony.

Student found hanging

By VICTORIA JONES
Collegian Staff

A 21-year-old UMass student unsuccessfully tried to hang himself after he was taken into protective custody at the Amherst town jail early yesterday morning.

The student, whose name was not released by police, was taken to University Health Services after the desk officer, Frederick Shepard found the student hanging by his pants, released him and administered successful cardiac massage.

Shepard found the student in his cell shortly after the student and two other persons, one a UMass student, were taken into protective custody for disorderly conduct in the vicinity of the Mary Lyons House in the Northeast Residential area.

Shepard was credited by Amherst Police Chief Donald Mia with saving the man's life. The student was transferred to Cooley-Dickinson Hospital in Northampton, and later released.

In an unrelated incident, the Graduate Research Towers were threatened with a bomb scare yesterday morning.

At 9:30 a.m. a receptionist for Chancellor Henry Koffler received a call from an unidentified male who said a bomb was going to go off between the first and fifth floors of the Graduate Tower. Assistant Director of Security Philip Cavanaugh was notified shortly after and by 9:52 the Graduate complex had been evacuated.

The fire department and many several police cruisers responded to the call, and the area was searched. No explosives were found, and the area was reopened at 10:30.

A final exam had been scheduled in room 212 of the center at the time of the scare.

Coach pleads innocence in child assault

NORTHAMPTON, (AP) – Anthony R. Williams, Northampton High School's varsity baseball coach, pleaded innocent in Hampshire District Court yesterday to a charge of indecent assault and battery on a child under 14, authorities said.

Williams, 38, a Northampton resident, was released on personal recognizance pending a pretrial conference Dec. 17.

George W. Powers, state police detective lieutenant, said Williams was arrested about 10 p.m. Sunday after an incident in Hatfield. He was released overnight for arraignment.

Officials at John F. Kennedy Junior High School in Northampton, where Williams is a mathematics teacher, said a substitute taught his class on yesterday. School officials also said no decision on the teacher's status will be made until the school committee meets on Thursday.

Sewer problems fixed

Selectmen review repairs

By SEAN HARVEY
Collegian Staff

The Amherst Board of Selectmen last night heard a report from Town Manager A. Louis Hayward on action taken by the town to alleviate sewer drainage problems in the Orchard Valley section of town.

In a memo to the Board Hayward said the Eastern Pipe Service Company, Inc. of Hudson, N.H. was hired to conduct a television inspection of the sewer system in Orchard Valley. Leaks found at main sewer joints and cracks at sewer manholes were sealed.

The Department of Public Works is in the process of repairing and raising manholes on the sewer main interceptor line along Muddy Brook from West Pomeroy Lane to Hampshire College. Frames in these manholes were found to be off center and leaking and in some cases were raised three to four feet, Hayward said.

The Board was acting in response to a petition from 80 Orchard Valley homeowners who appeared at an October 29 meeting of the board to protest drainage and sewage problems causing basement flooding during heavy rain storms.

Hayward will report back to the board on the problem in early January.

Chairman William Atkins said he is going "to miss Selectwoman Nancy Eddy greatly," who is stepping down from her position on April 7 after having served three terms.

O'Connell was authorized to patch or replace the damaged bricks as needed.

'This sure is typical of the BBC — pursuing the cheap and dirty way out in the hope that the problem will go away.'

— George Norton, Physical Plant director

At a final cost of $7,500, O'Connell's men repaired the bricks on the south side of the library. Because of cold weather, however, they were unable to work on the east and west sides.

Chips were still falling in February 1976 when the group reconvened, only this time there was a new element. The meeting was in the BBC's Boston office, instead of at UMass, and UMass representatives were not notified.

"This sure is typical of the bureau (BBC)—pursuing the cheap and dirty way out in the hope that the problem will go away," George Norton, director of the physical plant, wrote to Director of University Planning Jack Littlefield, after learning of the meeting from a Maguire engineer. "Daniel O'Connell is already on the site proceeding to make repairs."

At the Boston meeting, the BBC had authorized O'Connell to do repair work similar to the work he had already done for UMass on the south face of the library. Since only three new fractures had been discovered on the south side since O'Connell had completed the work two months before, it was assumed the work was successful.

Since the repair work required O'Connell to keep workers at the library for nearly a month, O'Connell said he would not absorb the entire cost of the repair work. The bureau agreed to pay for one-half, the rest to be paid by O'Connell. According to O'Connell, his firm was not totally responsible.

Maguire, repeating his original contentions that the problem was not structural, told the group that he would not pay for any part of the repair work.

More Repair Work

The bureau representative, before adjourning the meeting, told O'Connell to submit a bill for the work to the BBC on a change order, a document used during the construction of building to request permission to deviate from the plans and collect money for cost overruns.

By using a change order, the BBC could pay for the work as though it was an extension of the original construction and would not need to open any other accounts.

In authorizing O'Connell to perform the patch-up work, the BBC circumvented the original intention of the group to discuss the findings of an analysis done by Stone since the February meeting. A letter from Stone to the BBC, written before the meeting, stated Stone's repair would cost $171,000.

With little correspondence from the BBC, UMass officials became increasingly frustrated. "The entire matter seems to have been handled in a very haphazard and disorganized way with little or no direction being provided by anyone," Liberman wrote to Littlefield on Dec. 30, 1976, shortly after the BBC had authorized O'Connell to do the work and submit the bill on a change order.

Liberman added that the original patch-up work authorized by UMass had not proved effective. Littlefield had already written to Walter Poitrace, BBC director, asking him why O'Connell would not be required to absorb a portion or all of the costs for the south face as with the BBC.

"I have reviewed this problem with Chancellor Bromery and as we at the University are the ones that must live with the inherent dangers involved and the reactions of the students, faculty and staff," Littlefield wrote. "We would request that under no circumstances should this repair project proceed further without involvement of University representatives."

But by February of 1976, O'Connell had completed patching the east and west sides, and Maguire had inspected the work. A telescopic scan of the sides four months later gave reason to believe that the patches had ended the problem -- no fractures were found.

In May 1978, using the same scanning equipment, only one fracture was found on the south side. The other sides were free from defective bricks. Norton's wish for a sixth elevator seemed possible.

Workers began dismantling the wooden barrier, which had surrounded the library for nearly two years, in the summer of 1978. Before the last of it was taken away, however, more chips were discovered lying at the base of the southeast corner.

The Loomis Report

Complaints from library officials prompted Liberman to request Loomis to investigate the facade's construction. On the completion of the Loomis report, Chancellor Henry Koffler declared the library off-limits to UMass' 25,000 students and faculty members.

In his report, Loomis confirmed the observations of the BBC, O'Connell and Maguire and Stone in earlier reports. Mortar had been placed in the control joints, the bricks were saw-cut as opposed to pre-formed, and the problem would be recurring. But Loomis went one step further. In an analysis of the concrete insert assemblies he determined that the bolts, specified by the contract drawings were inadequate. The insert assemblies would hold 3,800 pounds, 1,700 pounds more than the maximum load specified by the manufacturer. The actual load upon them, the weight of the brick panel, was 6,000 pounds.

"The large pullout forces on the inserts is extremely dangerous and extreme measures should be taken immediately to protect life and property," Loomis wrote in his report. "It is a sad day for me to report such complex and costly problems to you, but, obviously, corrective measures must be made before a catastrophe occurs."

After receiving the Loomis report, UMass officials notified the BBC. Two other firms, contracted to scrutinize Loomis' findings, agreed with Loomis.

In October, the firm of Simpson, Gunhertz and Heger, of Boston, were contracted to do an in-depth study. According to the BBC, the Simpson report has not been released to the public and will not be released before intercession. But Frank O'Connell, vice president of O'Connell's Sons, said in an interview that he had talked with an engineer of the Simpson firm, and was told the final report will agree with Loomis.

The problem

What is wrong with the library? It depends on who is making the evaluation.

One UMass official has speculated that Maguire, who specified the size of the bolts on the contract drawings, will argue that O'Connell did not properly construct the brick panels. There is mortar in the joints, whereas the plans specified compressive filler. The bricks laying on the iron angle were saw cut instead of preformed, and have less strength.

O'Connell, on the other hand, will contend that Maguire is at fault. The insert assemblies securing the facade are not appropriate and the mortar in the joint has prevented the panels from falling.

According to Paul Good, of the Attorney General's Office, the issue may take months of investigation followed by years of litigation before it is resolved.

What's going wrong

A FIVE PART SERIES

Holyoke firm builds problems

Editor's note: This is one of two stories appearing in today's Collegian in a five-part series dealing with campus building problems.

By KELLEY DOOLAN
Collegian Staff

O'Connell claims faulty planning

'. . .we're just about as confident as we can be that, in the end, it will show that it was absolutely a design problem.'

— O'Connell

Daniel O'Connell and Sons Inc., of Holyoke, whose building contracts for this campus total over $100 million, has built, among others, the Graduate Research Center, the University Library, the Campus Center and garage.

The 100-year-old construction company, which has consistently produced the lowest bid in nearly all projects they have bid for, also constructed Southwest and Sylvan Residential Area buildings, Boyden Gymnasium, the Whitmore Administration Building, the University Health Services building and parts of Machmer Hall and Morrill Science Building.

Some of the UMass buildings the O'Connell Company built have been having post-construction problems. The University Library has been closed since Aug. 31 after Raymond Loomis of Loomis and Loomis Inc., engineering consultants, stated in a report to administrators, "I would expect an earthquake to 'peel' this building of (its) brick veneer."

The Campus Center Garage has also been plagued with problems. In September 1978, a Loomis and Loomis report warned the garage had "many...serious" structural problems "which are apt to be dangerous to life and property."

Contracts for construction of UMass buildings are awarded by a competitive bidding system, according to state law. The University invites various contractors to review architectural plans and then submit their prices for the work to be done. In most cases, the lowest bidder receives the contract.

Of the frequency of the O'Connell Company being the lowest bidder for many UMass projects, company vice president for Purchasing Franklin O'Connell said, "We like to think it's because we're highly competitive. We didn't get anything. We were under-bidded on a couple of occasions. But when we got on campus, we had the advantage of already being present on the scene."

The presence of O'Connell's workers and equipment on campus was the company's advantage when it came time to bid for other projects, he said. The company was able to defray the costs of scheduling heavy equipment and specialized workers by having a number of projects going on simultaneously at UMass.

"One job might no justify a civil engineer 40 hours a week," O'Connell said, "but when you have two or three jobs he can float between all of them. The same thing with materials and staging forms and stuff like that; once we're done we just move them to the next job down the street.

"We had the largest crane in Western Massachusetts. We bought it to do those twenty-two story dorms at Southwest. That definitely gave us a big leg up because just to move one of those cranes probably costs $30,000 or $40,000. We (also) used it for the Graduate Research Center and the Library."

"Probably the biggest single factor in our favor," O'Connell said, "is that being a local employer we really have the best foremen and even some of the best journeymen pretty well sewed up on our payrole. Most of them would rather work for us. They know that throughout the years their best bet is with us. That in the end is what can make more difference than anything else."

O'Connell agreed that after a building is finished, it is common to expect a certain amount of problems, usually just finishing touches. "We even carry something in our bid for it. (It's) that nickle and dime stuff that you've got to do to make the building (perfect)," he said.

"If someone has just shelled out several million bucks for a building they expect perfection and we try to give it to them."

In the case of the library, O'Connell did not think that the amount of money needed for repairs after completion was normal. "It (the library) is a sorry subject in that every time it come up our name gets involved but we're just about as confident as we can be that, in the end, it will show that it was absolutely a design problem," O'Connell said.

"We've build probably twenty-five buildings up there most of which had a brick facade, and not one of them had a problem. I think that's pretty good—prima-face—evidence that we know how to put up a brick facade and not have it fall down. We have a good reputation in that area," he said.

The multi-million dollar company's projects have not been restricted to UMass alone. Since building the high rise dorms in Southwest the company has constructed numerous large and high-rise buildings in Western Massachusetts, including Springfield's Civic Center and Bay State West complex. O'Connell has done extensive work on the state's highways, bridges and dams, and has participated in the construction of several power plants and scores of other projects large and small throughout New England.

Tomorrow the Collegian will examine the UMass Building Authority's building procedures and the flaws that marr them.

Women bring three plays to life

By ANN FARIS
Collegian Staff

The small theatre of the Munson Memorial Library in South Amherst Common was filled with both humor and tragedy Saturday night as the Woman's Community Theatre presented three one-act plays. About 25 people attended the latest production by the all-women's theatre group, which has been active in the Amherst area for the past five years.

The show began with the musical comedy "The Notorious McCorkle Sisters," a story of two boisterous sisters who sing and dance their way through bank robberies and stage coach holdups in the old west. The sisters, portrayed by Debby Lyons James and Annie Sussman, twirl their guns about the stage with good expression and voice. They are pursued by a pot-bellied sheriff, Denise Roberge, anxious for revenge on the sister, who shot off his nose. Maureen Pierce puts in a good performance as his obliging deputy, who can drawl the word "yeah" slower than anyone in the west.

A balladier croons that the moral of the tale is to keep on trying. The McCorkle sisters do just that with the aid of an energetic chorus and a bar room dancer named Rosy.

The play lacks good props and costumes; the low budget of the WCT makes it difficult to provide these. Some of the bit players also seemed inexperienced, especially those impersonating men.

"The American War Mothers" follows "McCorkle Sisters," featuring Eileen Stewart, producer of WCT, and Diane Hohn. Written by Roma Greth and directed by Catherine King, "War Mothers" takes place in 1943 and centers around two women planning memorial services for a local boy who died at the front.

Hohn skillfully acts as Ida Burke, the patriotic and domineering club woman who funnels all her energy into charitable events, serving on committees and perserving historical monuments. Eileen Stewart's Sissy is a more sensitive woman who is at odds with her sincere desire to help the war cause and the empty tasks she must perform. Stewart moves powerfully through Sissy's transition from a submissive and self denying woman, confused by the meaningless war rituals and Ida's belittling demands, to a woman able to admit her true feelings and move outside the social boundaries of her time.

The single prop used in "War Mothers" is effective. The almost empty stage represents the void in each woman's life. And while Ida rambles about, imagining the space to be yet another memorial park, Sissy sees the vastness for what it is, and is frightened by it.

"War Mothers" is not so much anti-war as it is against the secondary role left to women while their husbands and sons are active at the factory or on the battlefield.

The final play in the series, "Ten Years After," was written and directed by Sarah Allman, who has been a member of the ensemble since 1975. Allman's play focuses on the reunion of two women who went to college together in the fifties and loved each other from a distance.

Carol Smith portrays Karen, who even after admitting her love of Stacey after ten years cannot set aside her social status and cope with her real emotions. Stacey is played beautifully by Lis Brook, who shows the loneliness and quiet fear of a woman whose loves and desires are not considered acceptable.

The play is tragic because nothing is resolved between the two women. Karen returns to her husband and children. Stacey remains isolated and aloof. But perhaps the reunion has taught each of them more about themselves and confirmed for Stacey that her love was shared.

All the plays presented by WCT in this series are original work. "We are going to try to keep to original work. Our group is really dedicated to giving women an opportunity to develop theatre skills," Stewart said Thursday.

WCT is funded from a grant from the Everywoman's Center Alumni Trust Fund received in 1975, and subsequent money collected through admissions to their shows. Allman recently was given a grant from the Mssachusetts Council on the Arts and Humanities for a play to be performed in the spring.

Although WCT is exclusive to women, Stewart said, "We do not come out and do these productions heavy with propaganda about women's rights. We feel it is very political as is, because when you come into the theatre and you open that program everything is done by women."

The plays will be presented Saturday Sunday nights, Dec. 15 and 16 at 8 p.m. at the Munson Memorial Library.

On banishing malice

Elved Owens

Friday's Collegian reported that the Chancellor has decided to form a committee to combat 'derogatory attitudes' on campus. This is a reaction to concern expressed by 35 members of the Jewish Faculty Interest Group at the "regular appearance of Anti-Semitic articles and editorials" in the Collegian and Nummo News. However, I think that the main impetus for the movement came from reactions to 'Masters of the Media,' the dire pamphlet put out by the Iranian Students Association, a body which has understandably consigned itself to the 'Where are they now?' museum of political embarrassment.

The Interest Group says that editorials contribute to a climate "in which Jewish students live in intimidation and fear." "Intimidation and fear" suggests something more serious than loony articles in the college press. Has anybody been threatened with violence? Is there hard evidence of serious intimidation? Has the law been notified?

We don't know exactly because for inexplicable reasons the Interest Group has shrouded its deliberations in secrecy, rather ostentatiously showing the press the door. What was this conclave up to? Were we to watch for white smoke billowing out of Whitmore and the announcement that the 35 Founding Fathers within had constructed a New Morality which would henceforth banish ignorance and malice from the human heart?

I do not consider the establishment of a committee with the bewildering mandate to combat "derogatory attitudes" an appropriate response to certain inadequacies in Nummo News and the Collegian. Of course there is a limit to what anyone can be reasonably expected to tolerate but providing there is no violence the best way to counter pernicious views is with stringent criticism and robust argument. And these are primarily the responsibilities of the UMass student body and its press and should not be shifted to the shoulders of some impotent committee on high.

This said, I frequently do not like what I read in the College press. Nummo News, which purports to represent that famous 'ideological fiction' the Third World, merely bends with the prevailing radical breeze. For example, the Palestinian cause is in fashion these days (which is not to say that it isn't a valid cause), unlike the cause of, say, the 12 million Kurds who have been fighting desperately for their rights since 1945. When I express concern over international terrorism people say: "Imperialists don't listen to a cause until you kill." If the conspicuously silent history of the Kurds who, as the Guardian Weekly recently pointed out, "kill no ambassadors...hijack no planes," is anything to go by, the self-proclaimed champions of the oppressed don't listen much either. Purporting to represent a Third World united by the oppression it suffers, Nummo News is selective about the suffering on which it dwells. Does it reflect the diverse and complex aspirations of varieties of nationalistic peoples? Or is it merely the house magazine of a settled ideological viewpoint, taking full advantage of paralyzed liberal opinion which is so riddled with guilt that it has lost all nerve, principle and critical integrity?

At the Collegian the problem is the lack of any coherent viewpoint. As an independent columnist I note the distinctive feature of Collegian editorial policy: There is no editorial policy. Like a patient old horse the Collegian appears more concerned that nobody should be stopped from climbing on its back than about whether everyone has a right to be there in the first place, or in which direction the old nag should trot. There is no clear line between 'what the Collegian says' and what misfits like me say. In fact, the editorial process would appear to be so constipated by the democratic principle that the Collegian rarely 'says' anything at all on its own behalf, with the result that provocative articles are published, without comment, and various Interest Groups begin rushing to the defense of the Republic.

If there are excessively malicious views being expressed on campus then the debate over them should be taking place in these pages, and be of editorial concern. The alternative for us, as students, is to concede that someone else—the Chancellor's committee?—must tell us the difference between right and wrong.

Elved Owens is a Collegian columnist.

The finger is pointing

The index finger of the right hand refused to do its work: It would not perform its function of moving to the higher keyboard while the small finger of the left hand hit the shift button. At least not, unless other functions followed -- other than the space bar.

In other words, or letters, the right index finger was useless for anything other than its prime function.

However, that prime function was not derived from anything: It was not innate or anything like that, but rather acquired: Darwin was wrong, in the case of the right index finger, anyway. But the functions of the other fingers were nebulous, too. There was no simple answer to the question; to the problem.

The work of all fingers was impersonal: Nothing would change that for the present future, at the very least: Nothing would say what should have been said.

It had been written about, presumaly, by Gunter Grass -- in some strange script. But no one knew what that was supposed to mean, either: It didn't address the problem any better than anything else.

Thus the problem was indeed the question: What should be addressed? What has been addressed? What will be addressed in the future? Why?

That was the question: Why? But the index finger had nothing to do with it, which was unfortunate, because it should have had a hand in it: The hand begged the finger for help.

The finger was remote: It cared not for the hand's well being, but it cared not, either, if it should be severed itself or if it should not be severed.

The index finger, in short, was ignorant. For it had to be, knowing not that it had to destroy itself, and the hand, if it was to create. Whether or not it was made to be a creator was neither here nor there. For each finger cannot refrain from doing such, as the case may be, whether in conjunction with the hand or not.

What anything had to do with anything had to do with anything, the finger knew not. And conversely, what nothing had to do with nothing, it knew not, too.

Thus, the index finger stood out like a sore thumb.

But further, the finger knew not what it lacked: or, indeed, what it didn't lack. It was smug in its ignorance; taking pride in its acquired knowledge, however useless that knowledge may have been.

The finger had been acquired, however and after all, through a long process of idiocy stretching back to its origin: Darwin was right, in the case of the right index finger, anyway.

Campus buildings: Some like it cool

To the Editor:

I find it puzzling, in light of our attempts as a nation to conserve energy, that many of our university buildings are consistently overheated, often to the point of discomfort.

There can be no doubt that all of us have heard the call from Washington, widely publicized and discussed, for us to limit our use of fuels in an intelligent manner so as to cut as far as we can our costly dependence on imported fossil fuels. It is a fact that the room temperature is regulated by law to 69 degrees F. My question, then, is why these buildings are heated to room temperatures of 75, or even higher (Goodell's thermostats consistently read 85!). It is surely not for our comfort, as the stifling heat in Goodell, for example, requires students to shed their many layers for t-shirts, and forces the use of fans and opened doors and windows for circulation.

I would be greatly interested in whatever information the Collegian could provide concerning this annoying, uncomfortable, and downright illegal practice in our public buildings—whose responsibility is it to provide and maintain heating services in these buildings, and what notice, if any, has this situation received from these quarters?

As final exams approach, and our already restricted studying facilities become even more uncomfortably crowded, I wonder just how much we students need this aggravation and impingement upon our study environment.

President's man: Write to hostages

To the Editor

Many Americans are looking for a way to express concern for their fellow citizens being held hostage in Iran that is consistent with this country's respect for law. As you know, the American Charge in Iran, Bruce Laingen, who is being held at the Foreign Ministry, has suggested that church bells be rung each noon until the hostages are released. Several members of Congress and the Attorney General also have suggested that Americans write the Iranian Mission at the United Nations to demand release of the hostages.

The President endorses these suggestions.

It is of overriding importance that Iranian authorities understand that Americans are united in their determination not to yield to blackmail and in the demand for the safe return of the hostages. Your support for these two suggestions will help prevent any miscalculation of where Americans stand in this time of crisis.

UMass production worth a visit

By ANNE MEHITABEL
Collegian Staff

"The Visit" by Friedrich Durrenmatt, opened last Friday at the Rand Stage, the last University Ensemble Theater production of the semester. Although the play poses many stylistic problems and there appears to be many loose threads and inconsistancies in this production, it is well worth seeing.

The play is an allegory about the richest woman in the world who returns to her impoverished hometown to "buy justice." She offers the townspeople $1 billion if they deliver to her the body of her childhood lover who declined her. Bizarre Elements and characters surround this woman, Claire Zachanassian, as she sits and waits for her ultimatum to be carried out.

The play is a mixture of realism and epic presentationalism, expressionism and naturalism, comedy and tragedy. No wonder a consistency of style is difficult to achieve.

For the most part, the production choices were not particularly jarring, except for some striking differences in acting styles. It seemed that bits of character business and schtick stole strength from the allegorical style that was developing.

The choral passages, the impressive expressionistic ending of Act I, and the murder sequence were weakened by show biz antics such as when an old teacher and doctor sit on the same barrel and fall all over one another. Likewise, the strength of archetypes that were well-portrayed by Richard Trousdell, Rick Martin and Dennis Hagan as the teacher, the policeman and the pastor, respectively, were lessened by the carelessness of Robert Lehan who portrayed Burgermeister with no style or emphasis. Lehan lacked the stature of the role he was playing.

The play works because of John Milligan and Jiny Lindenauer's particularly fine acting. Milligan played Alfred III as enough of a lovable fool, a sap, as to make his eventual sacrifice of himself reach a level of epic grandeur.

Lindenauer, as Claire, was effective in creating the eccentricity of this woman but lost power when her wickedness deteriorated to romanticism, conveying a pathetic quality rather than horror.

Durrenmatt warns in the play's postscript that an overly serious treatment of the end of the play would be disaster, but unfortunately the vulnerability of Claire as she bids Alfred a final "adieu," weakened the power of the parable.

Of the students in the cast, Alan Arenius as the butler, deserves the most praise. His portrayal was as fantastical as it was believable. The ensemble episodes of the play were also done professionally, and the student cast effectively portrayed the townspeople as they trampled Alfred III in their race to achieve the rank of "nouveau riche."

Except for the basic structure of the set -- functional at best -- the set and lighting design were extremely effective. A sign, set piece or symbol set the scene of the action. A gigantic spider web, for instance, depicts both Petersen's Barn and Claire's spinning of the fates of Gullen. The light shines through the web onto the barn floor, ensnaring Claire in the middle of her web.

The final chorus scene is a perfect vehicle for the designers to depict Gullen, the glutton of commercialism. Garish little twinkle lights bombard the stage as a neon "Gullen" flashes across the old train station. This image hits home at Christmas as we are all rushing to KMart to purchase our own twinkle lights and tinsel to turn our homes into little Gullen havens.

"The Visit" is a provocative choice for the holiday season. It plays this Thursday, through Saturday at 8 p.m. and is well worth "the trip."

The last attack occurred after Newton and Konstanlopulos returned with coffee. Both Newton and Konstanlopulos testified when they arrived both Rampersad and Pitzer were asleep.

A Shower

Konstanlopulos awakened Rampersad and carried her to the shower, he said. He placed her sitting in shower which was "a bit on the cold side," he said. After the shower he dropped her on the rug while trying to carry her back to bed, he said. Rampersad was conscious and awake but he "did not recall" if she nodded her head or indicated in any way that she was conscious of anything he did or said, Konstanlopus testified.

When Konstanlopus was recalled to the stand he told the court he had attempted to clear Rampersad's air passages because he though "she might have been biting her tongue. I opened up her mouth and used two fingers trying to make her throw up and she did, " he said.

Konstanlopulos said he later "put the spoon across her mouth so she wouldn't bite her tongue again." (It was reported that Rampersad's body had black and blue marks around her mouth.) He further testified he gave Rampersad coffee after he carried her back to bed after the shower.

Newton's testimony conflicted with Konstanlopulos'. She testified Konstanlopulos tried to give Rampersad coffee, which Newton thought was too hot, before Kkonstanlopulos carried Rampersad to the shower, rather than after.

Rampersad "seemed to be resisting it (the coffee) and she wound up spitting it out. Jimmy could get no response from her. He seemed to be getting aggravated and he took her and brought her to the shower and I told him it wasn't a good idea," Newton said.

Vomiting

Newton also said Rampersad's eyes were closed when Konstanlopulos laid her in the bathtub. She testified Konstanlopulos carried the 4'8", 86 lb. Rampersad out of the shower and "accidently dropped her," dried her with a bedspread and put her to bed. Next "he took her to the bathroom again to induce vomiting."

Both Newton and Konstanlopulos testified that Pitzer awoke during Rampersad's last seizure-like "attack."

Newton said Rampersad was having an "attack" after being in the shower and she said she held Rampersad while Pitzer put his wallet in Rampersad's mouth.

Tommorrow the Collegian will outline the remainder of the inconsistencies in the inquest testimony found by groups seeking to re-open the case.

THIS IS THE ARMY
WHAT'S IN IT FOR YOU? THE OPPORTUNITIES ARE ALMOST ENDLESS . . .
AND THAT MAKES THE ARMY WHAT YOU CHOOSE TO MAKE IT FOR YOURSELF.

full-time
When you think about it, the Army can't be all "front line." There are thousands and thousands of men and women handling technical jobs in support units.
Of course, you may choose the Army for the challenge and the travel—a needed pause in your life to discover your real self. Or, instead, you may choose one of the thousands of opportunities in the support units—like training and gaining on-the-job experience in the medical field, computer technology, music, food service, mechanics, to name a few. Training and experience that can lead to a high-paying job when you come home.
You may choose to sign up for one of certain positions that pay a cash bonus of up to $3000. And, by your own choice too, you can sign up for educational assistance . . . so you come home with up to $8100 for continuing your education.
Today's Army is people . . . each taking advantage of a personal opportunity. Open the door to the future you want. The Army gives guarantees for your choices. See your Army recruiter today.

part-time
The expense of a full-strength, full-time Army in peacetime would be too high. That's why there's an Army Reserve. And that's where you'll find the opportunity to earn extra income and learn a valuable skill—at home.
The part-time pay of the Army Reserve can make the difference in keeping up with inflation and your bills. And yet your unit meets at your nearby Reserve Center only 16 hours a month—usually one weekend—and two weeks in the summer at an Army post.
Many units offer either a bonus of up to $1500 or up to $2000 toward college. And there's full-time pay for your initial basic and advanced individual training.
The Army Reserve is the perfect answer if you are a student or a man or woman who prefers to take advantage of Army opportunities at home. See your Army recruiter today.

YOU'LL NEVER KNOW "WHAT'S IN THE ARMY FOR YOU" UNLESS YOU START ASKING QUESTIONS. SO CALL YOUR NEAREST ARMY RECRUITING STATION—OR BETTER STILL STOP BY—TODAY!

Kennedy said the senator would institute hospital cost and quality controls. "As the senator says, 'The question is not whether we can afford hospital costs but that we can't afford not to have health insurance,' " Kennedy said. Costs would be less if Medicaid and Medicare merged into one prepaid program and if "a handle was gotten on malpractice."

The senator believes that the country cannot afford to build new nuclear power plants, Kennedy said, because they are not proven safe; however, he wouldn't shut down those

Harvard foils fencing team

In fencing action this past weekend, the UMass men's fencing club team was defeated by a powerful Harvard squad on Saturday at the Crimson's Indoor Athletic Building in Cambridge. Instrumental in the UMass effort were newcomer Daryl Brown and captain Ian Montgomery.

The Minutewomen team didn't fare much better as they fell to Harvard also by a 10-6 score. In junior varsity action, the Harvard men defeated the UMass contingent by a 17-10 score.

Two matmen place in tourney

By DONNA SULLIVAN
Collegian Staff

A rough schedule is taking its toll on the UMass wrestlers as just two of the Matmen placed in last week's Morgan State Invitational Tournament. 118-pound Rich Schiarizzi and 190-pound Bill McQuade each won three matches and lost two to place fourth in the double elimination tourney.

"I think we have been on the road too much," Coach Dave Amato said. "We have a hard schedule and we were not really ready for the tournament," he said. "Tournaments like that are good competition and experience for the guys."

Eight schools participated in the tournament held at Morgan State.

Today the Matmen face the Army cadets in a dual meet at 4:00 at West Point. The UMass wrestlers are hoping to bring a 2-0 record to 3-0.

"The guys are psyched for Army and we have got to regroup," said Coach Amato. "It will be a good meet for us. We won last year and it was a big win. They are good and we will have to wrestle real well to beat them," he said.

Runners defeated by BU

Editor's note Due to a miscalculation of space, the women's track story that appeared in yesterday's Collegian was incomplete. The following is a complete account of the BU meet. We apologize for the error.)

By JIM GRAHAM
Collegian Staff

In their first meet of the season, the UMass women's indoor track team lost to Boston University 69-39 in Boston last Saturday. "We did well for what expected. We had many more performances on the positive side than on the negative side," coach Arnie Morse said.

Freshman shotputter Diane Boczanowski and long jumper Jackie Budrow led UMass in the field events and were the only Minutewomen to win their individual events. Boczanowski threw the shot 31'13" for a personal record in her first college meet. Budrow jumped 16'¼" to take first with UMass sophomore Micki Callahan taking third. Julie Horgan placed third in the high jump with a jump of 4'8".

BU's Elumelu, an Olympian from Nigeria, finished first in both the 55 meters dash and the 55 meter hurdles. UMass freshman Angie Caouette, running her first race ever, placed a close second to the Olympian and Micki Callahan took second in the hurdles. "BU was strong in the sprints but we have some young talent in the dashes and field events with Budrow, Caouette and Callahan," Morse said.

The depth of the Minutewomen came through in both the middle distance and distance events. Diane Sealey picked up a second place in the 400 meters in 59.9. Cyndi Martin and Caroline Gardner placed second and third in the 800 meters respectively. Martin's time was 2:18 in a close race against the BU finisher.

In the distance races, three of four Minutewomen set personal records in their races. In the mile, sophomore Judy McCrone and junior Linda Welzel placed second and third. McCrone ran her fastest indoor mile on the new BU track with a time of 4:56. "It felt smooth and easy. We don't have a lot of speed now but cross-country really helped," McCrone said.

A close and exciting two-mile race gave UMass second and third places and two personal records in the process. Sophomores Cathy Petrick and Judy Burke finished behind BU's Orleman in second and third spots. Petrick's time was 10:59 with Burke close behind in 11:01. BU's Orleman, the top ranked distance runner for BU and a scholarship athlete, won both the mile and the two-mile in Saturday's meet.

"UMass doesn't give out money for track scholarships so we have to look for young talent to develop," Morse said.

In the relays, UMass lost both the 4x200 meters and the 4x400 meter races. The highlight of the meet for UMass was in the 4x800 meter relay where the team of McCrone, Welzel, Tricia Moores and Burke combined to completely dominate the race to finish a full minute ahead of the BU team. All of the UMass runners in the 4x800 ran personal records on the way to a time of 9:52.

Hoopwomen lose at buzzer, 75-74

By DANNY GUIDERA
Collegian Staff

There are heartbreakers and then there are heartbreakers.

Texas A & M guard Kelley Sullivan sank a 12-footer at the buzzer to give the Aggie Ladies a 75-74 win over the women's basketball team last night at the Cage.

The defeat was the first Minutewomen loss of the season and put their record at 2-1. Julie Ready led all scores with 30 points, her second thirty point game of the season.

The Minutewomen, who had not held the lead since midway through the first half, rallied back and tied the Aggies (who had led by as much as seven early in the second half) at 51 with 12:36 remaining on the clock. Texas A & M fought back on the strength of center Lori Foreman, who missed much of the first half because of foul trouble, and took the lead 65-61 with six minutes remaining in the game.

Ginger Legare (10 points and two steals) hit a 10-footer to bring the Minutewomen within two, 67-65 at 5:31. Then at 5:13, Aggie forward Peggy Pope, who had hit for fifteen points and pulled down eight rebounds fouled out of the game.

"I thought our rebounding would be hurt when she fouled out," said Texas A & M coach Cherri Rapp, "plus, she's been our biggest scorer in the last three games."

Legare made good on a 10-foot turnaround shot to once again tie the score at 67. Aggie guard Lola Baker put Texas A & M up once more with a long shot at 3:17 of the half that was to see the lead change hands four times in forty seconds.

With two and a half minutes remaining, Sue Peters (12 points, 12 rebounds) hit a 15-point bank shot to make it 69-69. Almost immediately afterwards, Pat Werner of Texas A & M was fouled by Peters and hit two shots to put the Aggie Ladies back on top.

The Aggie Ladies' big center Foreman was called for traveling with 1:33 showing on the scoreboard and the Minutewomen took control of the ball. Freshman Val DePaolo was fouled and hit one from the line to cut the Texas A & M margin to one.

After Werner missed a shot Peters fed the ball to Julie Ready under the hoop with 40 seconds remaining to give the Minutewomen their first lead in nearly 28 minutes of playing time, 72-71.

Foreman put the Aggies up again, but Ready hit a right-side shot from 11-feet out to give the Minutewomen the lead, 74-73 with just 11 ticks of the clock remaining.

Eleven seconds and the ball was all that were left for the Aggie Ladies.

Sullivan took the ball upcourt, passed off to Foreman, Foreman to Werner, back to Sullivan and -- bingo. No more time remained on the clock.

"We've got to learn from this," said Minutewomen coach Mary Ann Ozdarski. "A loss like this is going to help us tremendously. I'd like to see URI (University of Rhode Island, who the Minutewomen play tomorrow night in Kingston) take the brunt of our frustration."

"UMass has a really fine team," said Rapp, "We were lucky to come out on top."

Rapp said that the Aggie Ladies' initial play was to get the ball to the 6'2" Foreman and have her put it up. "We wanted her to get it under the post but she was cut off (by Ready). We wanted to get it to her or number 12 (guard Baker, who hit for twelve points, mostly on long right side jumpers)."

Hot shooting by forward Tricia Corcoran kept the Minutewomen close early in the game when Texas A & M led by as much as six.

Pats go from contender to has-been in playoff race

By DICK BRAUDE
Associated Press

FOXBORO, Mass. — From Super Bowl contender to also-ran: The New England Patriots again have proved that preseason raves don't win National Football League games.

Sunday's loss to the New York Jets hammered the Patriots' coffin shut, closing out their playoff chances. But the previous game — a loss to the Dolphins in Miami — may have been sufficient to prove the NFL adage that New England can't win when it counts most.

Despite being picked last summer as a near-certain playoff participant, the Patriots have dipped to 8-7, with a game left against Minnesota. New England has now lost three straight, four of the last five.

"This team has great talent and when we were 'on' we were as good as anyone in the league," quarterback Steve Grogan said in New York after the game. "But we weren't 'on' enough. Why? I don't know...Something was missing."

The Patriots front office already is looking for the missing ingredient, a search that has continued since 1976.

That year, the upstart Patriots rocked the NFL with an 11-3 record under Chuck Fairbanks. Then, New England lost a tough playoff contest in Oakland, with controversial officiating playing a role.

In 1977, the team was rated high but slumped to 9-5 and missed the playoffs, in part because the Patriots caved in and lost a big game to a weak Buffalo team in Foxboro.

In 1978, Fairbanks walked out on the team and though he returned for an opening round playoff game, the Patriots lost to Houston.

Fairbanks supposedly lacked the emotional spark needed to inspire some of his players. Under Ron Erhardt, the Patriots were supposed to exhale fire.

Blaming injuries to stars such as fullback Sam Cunningham and tight end Russ Francis, team owner William H. Sullivan Jr. already has exonerated the coach, saying Erhardt will be back. So will General Manager Bucko Kilroy, whose trade of offensive tackle Leon Gray for future draft picks still has fans — and some players — carping.

With a large number of Patriots players in their contract option season, or heading into it, there's talk of a housecleaning in Foxboro. But Patriots Vice President Chuck Sullivan, the owner's son, said Monday he doubts it.

"Naturally we're disappointed," he said. "But we're not the first team picked to make the playoffs that didn't. We're going to win next week and have a winning season."

If so, it will be New England's fourth straight winning campaign — a cumulative record of 40-20 — without a playoff victory.

"Got a color TV
So I can see,
The Knicks play basketball."

---Rapper's Delight, Sugar Hill Gang

And if someone's nice enough to give Sly Williams a color TV for Christmas this year, rumor has it that he'll probably be watching the Knicks on Channel 9 for the rest of the season. Sly's lolly-gagging on the court and general, "Hi, I'm Sly and if you be nice to me, I'll let you see me play," attitude could make him the first winner of the John Brisker Memorial Award of the '80's.

Well, Sly, this isn't Kingston.

It's times like these that make me wish I was Peter Gammons. Peter could pick up the telephone right now, call St. Louis and ask John Claiborne what he is doing with Bobby Bonds. Stranger things have happened in sports, but none more consistently than the annual Bonds trade, which happens as often as, well, Billy Martin gets in barroom brawls.

But, I'm not Gammons, I can't even call Gammons and ask him. Geez, I've got trouble enough dialing for a pizza without getting in trouble.

The recent shower of trades and signings, proved to be as exciting as a wet noodle. Who changes hands except the Aurelio Rodriguezes, the Freddie Pateks and of course, Bill Naharodney. I guess that's what you get for holding the winter meetings in Toronto.

One trade I can't figure out is the Ron LeFlore for Danny Schatzeder deal. While Schatzeder has one of the best names to say in all major league sports (Bubba Bean running a close second and Orlando Woolridge in the college ranks) I wonder if this is just another manifestation of the Stan Papi syndrome.

Meaning that, since LeFlore is getting up there in years (he's 32) and he'll be a free agent next year, that maybe the Tigers just bailed out now and took all they could get. Or that the Tigers are so high on young Kirk Gibson that they don't want to bother spending the money of LeFlore. Still, he stole 78 bases last year and is by no means on the downswing. I don't know, maybe LeFlore could even become the next Dave Cash, seeing that there will be trouble fitting him in the Montreal outfield with the youthful and already speedy Ellis Valentine, Warren Cromartie and Andre Dawson. Maybe they'll unload Headache Ellis and he can become the next Bobby Bonds. The road goes on forever.

What would you do if you were NBA commissioner if Darryl Dawkins smashes another backboard. He wants to do it again, this man whose ambition in life is to bull down a backboard, mounting, floor, stands and stadium in a single dunk. Trouble is, next time he does it, he may kill someone even himself as hard as that it to believe. Suppose Bill Robinzine had gotten a piece of that plexiglass in his eye and was blinded for life? Suppose a large piece of plexiglass has come down and severed Dawkins head off? What would he do then?

Commissioner Larry O'Brien should make it be known in the sternest possible language, mentioning the words "Big, big fine" and "suspension," that he will not tolerate Dawkins abuse of players, fans, teammates and officials with his juvenile behavior.

From Evel Knievel stunts to basketball. If you can find a TV set that gets cable, it might be worth your while to catch Boston Channel 2's (yes, the public TV station) rebroadcast of the triple-overtime game between the Celtics and Suns played in 1976. Even though the Misadventures of Sherriff Lobo (short for lobotomy) may be on Channel 40, it's worth it to catch the game that ranks right up there as one of the most, if not the most exciting events in sports history. Besides, you even get to see Kevin Stacom!

The game is telecast Wednesday at 9:00.

For those of you who know such bizarre facts as Don Zimmer's middle name and Rick Miller's wife's famous brother (Pudge Fisk) it might be worth your while to call up WMUA tonight as the Sports Cafe presents it first (and probably the last) "Stump the Experts" Show. This extravaganza features hockey expert Mark Marchand, football expert Jim Mullins, hoop expert (he knows what Garfield Heard's favorite song is) Steve Zack, and New York sports expert Jim Spellos and a baseball card freak to be named later.

Be sure to ask Zack who the Knicks traded to the Bullets for Earl Monroe.

Blunders?

Contract bids lead to poor building quality

Editor's note: This is the third installment of a five-part series in the Collegian dealing with campus building problems.

By RICHARD NAGLE
Collegian Staff

It's a cause-and-effect relationship: The effects are leaking roofs in the Campus Center and dormitories and a crumbling Campus Center garage. The cause is the system used by the UMass Building Authority to construct campus buildings.

The UMBA was established in 1960 by the state legislature to arrange for the financing, design and construction of nearly $80 million worth of dormitories, dining commons, the Campus Center and garage, Alumni Stadium and North Village Apartments.

UMass buildings

What's going wrong

A FIVE PART SERIES

The long and complicated system that the UMBA uses begins first with a needs analysis. Requests for a dormitory, garage, or a classroom building are sent through the University hierarchy to the Board of Trustees. If the trustees consider the building necessary, they commission a feasibility study that examines the type of building, location, needed space and funding for the project. If the study comes back positive, the trustees ask either the UMBA or the state Bureau of Building construction to undertake the project.

The UMBA is responsible for all buildings that will generate revenue, such as the Campus Center Complex, dormitories or dining commons. The BBC builds all non-revenue projects such as the library and administrative buildings.

The trustees then give the UMBA the specifications for the desired building to begin a search for an architect. The BBC screens a group of architects' and artists' renderings of the project, submitting their choice to the trustees for approval.

After the architect is selected, the Authority and trustees meet to arrange financing the project. Bonds are issued to pay for the final plans. These plans are reviewed by the UMBA. The architect then hires a cost consultant to estimate the total cost of construction. Another bond issue is begun in line with that estimate.

Upon acceptance of the final plans from the architect, technically qualified engineers are not always consulted to review the drawings to ensure they conform to accepted engineering standards.

In January of 1979 a roofing inspection report for University officials was done by T.J. Holowchak Associates, Simsbury, Ct. The subject of the report was the cause of the leaks in the roofs of seven Southwest dormitories. The report states, "The architect's selection of materials to comprise the roofing system warrants comment." The report

Anthro class studies Amherst, University

By JIM LENNOX
Collegian Staff

A UMass anthropology class study of the Amherst area has proven that it is not necessary to travel to the ends of the earth to conduct anthropological research.

Anthropology Professor Johnnetta B. Cole's "Fieldwork in Anthropology" class last night gave an account of their unusual project at the Jones Library in Amherst. This unusual class utilized an extensive set of questionaires and interviews in a study of relations between Amherst residents and universities in the area.

Questionaires covered a wide range of topics from community relations with the University to drug usage among youths. Other questionaires delved into Amherst youth attitudes on sex and related topics, and a "tongue in cheek" entrance examination for living in the town of Amherst.

A wide variety of resources were used in addition to the interviews and questionaires, including a senior citizen newsletter, Amherst Woman's Club literature, tourist and restaurant information for the area, landlord/tenant information from both the town of Amherst and UMass' Student Center for Education Research and Advocacy, and a host of other sources.

The study focused on both community reaction to the University, and the University's reaction to the town. Town residents were asked such questions as "What is the Blue Wall?" and "What is the average age of a UMie?". University people were asked, what percentage of Amherst residents are actively engaged in farming (.4 percent), and other similar questions.

Specific areas of interest for the group were the University's effect on the area's businesses and economy, parenting among University and townpeople, interactions in musical events and in contradance, anti-nuke sentiments and proponents in the area, and senior citizens' feelings toward the student community.

While final date is not yet availabe, Cole emphasized the ongoing nature of the study, and some date which seemed rather sure. As expected, the University community makes a significant contribution to the area's economy, and parenting is universally similar among both groups.

Senior citizen attitudes toward the students were quite positive, although an awareness of the student-related housing shortage also means higher prices for their own rents.

The course has a two-fold purpose, according to Cole: to pioneer a unique and effective way to study the field of anthropology, and to develop an ongoing method for improving and maintaining good community relations. The study showed that both the town of Amherst and the University hold very positive attitudes toward maintaining good relations.

Off-campus activities such as contradance were also examined. These activities showed a greater variety of participation from both young and old. In response to the question of what can be done to improve Amherst/University relations, one respondent said: "more activites like contradance."

Carter eyes holiday

WASHINGTON (AP) — President Carter, offering a political olive branch to the largest union of government workers, said yesterday he is giving federal employees an extra Christmas holiday. The move will cost taxpayers at least $150 million.

Carter summoned the president of the American Federation of Government Employees to the White House to disclose his decision to make the day before Christmas, Monday, Dec. 24, a paid holiday for 2.1 million civil servants, thus giving them a four-day holiday weekend.

The order will not affect the independent U.S. Postal Service, whose workers are covered by collective bargaining contracts.

Granting the extra holiday is not unprecedented by a president. But inviting a labor leader to the White House to announce it was a first, according to the 250,000-member union, which viewed the event as an act of political courtship for the 1980 presidential election.

Hostages may be seen

TEHRAN, Iran — Iran's foreign minister said yesterday that international observers soon would see the Americans held hostage at the U.S. Embassy and that efforts were under way to assemble an international grand jury to hear charges against the deposed shah.

And in the Holy City of Qom, 100 miles to the south, the religious leader of Iran's Azeri Turkish minority said Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini must change his policies toward the dissident Azerbaijan region or face civil war. In an interview, Ayatollah Mohammed Kezam Shariat-Madari said he had no information on U. S. involvement in the northwest rebellion and indicated displeasure with Khomeini's policy of blaming the United States and "Zionism," for internal dissent.

Foreign Minister Sadegh Ghotbzadeh told a news conference, "We are going to have international observers to go and visit the prisoners in, I hope, a very short time, and afterwards I hope that visits will be (made) regularly."

continued: "The selection of materials selected (by the architect) to be components of the roof system are excellent materials individually but, in a system, leave much to be desired." Had the incompatability of the roofing materials been detected by engineers prior to construction, the Southwest roof problems might not have occurred.

According to former UMBA Vice-Chairman Evan Johnston, no in-depth research was done on the architect to check the firm's past performance or the possibility of involvement in litigation stemming from prior contracts.

A general contractor who is charged with the general construction and sub-contractors who specialize in various trades such as roofing or electrical work are now needed to start construction.

The UMBA sends-out bid specifications and, according to state law, must accept the lowest bid. The UMBA receives bids from sub-contractors, after sending them out to several general contractors who include the price of sub-contracted work in their bid. Therefore, the general contractor will usually select the lowest bids from sub-contractors to minimize costs.

While this low bid system does attempt to thwart political favoritism, it does not allow quality to be a factor in selecting a contractor. George A. Norton, director of the UMass Physical Plant, said, "Because of the low bid system it is almost impossible to not accept the low bidder on a project despite past bad experiences." This low bid system could be modified to allow the contractor's reputation, quality of materials and workmanship to be a factor in the selection process.

At this point the sub-and general contractors are subject to approval by the trustees and the UMBA. However, the contractors' backgrounds are not thoroughly researched, according to Johnston. If approval is gained, construction begins.

On each project, a "Clerk of the Works" is hired by the architect, whose job it is to oversee all facets of construction. The clerk's most important duty is to ensure the architect's specifications are met. The University has no representative on the worksite with any authority.

Norton described this lack of authority, stating, "Physical Plant engineers are the fifth wheel." The only supervisor with the power to halt construction is paid by the architect. The possibility of collusion between the architect and the contractor because of this producer was acknowledged by Norton.

The specifications for the garage called for #4 sized steel reinforcement bars in each of the 468 'T' shaped beamse that make up the structure. But #2 sized bars were observed in several of the beams by professional engineer Raymond Loomis of Loomis and Loomis Inc. The Windsor, Conn. consulting engineering firm was hired by the University during the past two years to determine the cause and extent of the building's problem and suggest a plan of repair.

In his 1979 report Loomis states, "Our corrective measures cannot change the cause of most of the problems, which, in my opinion, is the lack of steel in the T-beam stems." The reinforcement bars are half the size called for in the specifications. Supervision could have been provided during the construction of the sub-contracted beams.

In his report on Southwest dorms, engineer T.J. Holowchak states, "The current roof problems can be directly attributed to poor workmanship." Effective on-site supervision could also have prevented this costly and troublesome defect.

Aside from possible negligence, the clerk's lack of supervision may be due to the inability of an individual, however qualified, to have expertise in the numerous trades involved in construction. Ideally, the clerk should be able to call in specialists in fields where he has no experience. He could be directly employed by either the University or the UMBA instead of through the architect. This would ensure the University's interests during construction. To hold the clerk accountable, a prepared check list could be provided proving that the required duties have been fulfilled.

In 1970, the UMBA hired the Detroit engineering firm of Construction Consultants, Inc. to investigate the leaking Campus Center roof. In addition to this work, Construction Consultants made the following recommendations regarding UMBA procedures: First, that the architect's specifications be checked by submitting them to outside consultants before bidding. Second, that bidders be notified that strict adherence to the specifications will be required and carefully checked at every step, before bids are submitted. Last, that this strict adherence be enforced to the point of stopping work when specifications are not met.

These flaws in UMBA building procedures have led to the current state of UUMass buildings: nearly all of the authority's thirteen projects have defects, ranging from leaking roofs to crumbling walls. The UMBA has been taking steps to alleviate these problems. Perhaps if some of the above recommendations are adopted, past errors will not be repeated, millions of dollars will be saved, and the students who pay for and use these buildings will not be inconvenienced.

'Proof' varies in fatal case

Editor's Note: The following is the third installment of a five-part series examining the death of Seta T. Rampersad, a 20-year-old UMass student whose death last year spurred community concern when an inquest concluded no criminal negligence was involved.

This series was compiled by Betty Ciolek, Lee Goodwin, Darlene Lorkiewicz, Serena Richard and Robert E. Stein.

After Rampersad's last "attack," witnesses Carol Newton and Demeitrious Konstanlopulos testified that they left the Motel 6 at about 8 a.m., after Rampersad had gone back to sleep. The other witness, Brian Pitzer, testified that the last "attack" took place while it was dark out. He then said he went back to sleep while it was still dark and woke up again at 8 or 9 a.m.

Piter also testified that he saw Konstanlopulos putting a "spoon or something...down her mouth." He said he "could see the marks in the back of her throat." He said Rampersad's tongue was not bleeding and there were no bite marks.

From reading the testimony it becomes clear that the witnesses for the inquest differed greatly in their accounts of the night's events. All the witnesses agreed that they arrived at the Motel 6 in Deerfield between 2 a.m. and 2:30 a.m. and that drugs were consumed during the first hour.

The testimony began to conflict when the witnesses answered questions about the group shower.

Konstanlopulos did not even mention the group shower whereas both Newton and Pitzer testified that Konstanlopulos and Rampersad joined them in the shower.

Newton pinpointed the start of the shower at 3:30 a.m. before going to bed, contradicting Pitzer, who testified that the shower began at about 4 a.m., after he spent 40 minutes in bed.

Newton said, "He (Konstanlopulos) tried to put his arm around me. He was grabbing my rear end and looking and desiring, whatever, Seta and I both."

Konstanlopulos was not questioned about the group shower.

The final discrepancy was in Pitzer's testimony and described his actions after Konstanlopulos and Newton left the motel.

When first questioned, Pitzer said he became worried when Konstanlopulos did not return and he was unable to reach him by phone. He said he called an ambulance and then hitchhiked to the Castaway Lounge before the ambulance arrived. During this first testimony he said that no other person or persons saw Rampersad alive at the hotel other then himself, Konstanlopulos, and Newton.

Pitzer was recalled after a hotel maid testified that she helped a stocky blond man enter Rampersad's room before noon. Pitzer then admitted to calling a friend, Matther Sarafin, around noon "for a ride." Although he first insisted that they were never upstairs together, Pitzer later told the court that he let Sarafin in the room.

Sarafin, a registered nurse who worked at the Veteran's Administration Hospital in Northampton, testified that Pitzer called that morning to ask him to look at Rampersad. After Sarafin's arrival, which he said was sometime before 12:40, he began checking Rampersad's vital signs. Sarafin said that Rampersad looked "like she was a long term, a person who had been in a coma for quite a while."

Pitzer testified that "there was no panic on his part, but Sarafin said Pitzer was nervous and insisted he needed a nurse.

Pitzer was unable to determine the last time he took Rampersad's pulse. At first he said, "It was before I went down to see if I could have the room longer," but later he said, "I think I took it before I went down to call the ambulance."

Pitzer did not respond when asked, "Is it possible that she might have been dead a couple of hours when you were running around trying to figure out what to do?"

An article in the Valley Advocate revealed that at 10:30 a.m., the time at which Pitzer was seen by two motel employees in the hotel lobby, another hotel employee knocked on the door of Rampersad's room and a male voice responded.

This incident was not brought up during the inquest.

According to the testimony of Sarafin, Rampersad was still alive when the two men left the hotel but her vital signs had declined. When the ambulance arrived, about 10 minutes later, the attendants found Rampersad dead. The ambulance attendant felt rigidity in Rampersad's hand when he arrived around 1 p.m. Dr. John H. Olsen (now deceased medical examiner and the first to perform an autopsy on Rampersad) said Rampersad was definitely rigid when the undertaker came between 2 and 2:30 p.m. Dr. Olsen also said rigor mortis (the stiffening of the body after death) takes 10 hours to set in.

According to state laws governing inquests, "When any person is supposed to have died suddenly (and not disabled by a recognizable disease), it shall be the duty of any person having knowledge of such a death to immediately notify the medical examiner of the known facts concerning the time, place, manner circumstances and cause of such a death."

If Rampersad had died before Sarafin and Pitzer left the room, the two men would be in violation of this law.

Tomorrow the Collegian will present background information on Rampersad and the four witnesses, in part four of the five-part series.

CC improvement voted by GSS

By LAURA SMITH
Collegian Staff

The Graduate Student Senate last night agreed to approve the Board of Governor's Concourse Improvement Policy and to constitute a Concourse Improvement Panel. The Senate also wrapped up the semester with a Treasurer's review report.

BOG Operations Chairman Curtis Wohlers spoke to the senate in favor of the improvement policy and panel. The purpose of the policy is for improvement of the concourse, and to ensure that funds collected from the concourse vendors go toward intended improvement projects, rather than being absorbed by the Building Maintenance Account, Wohler said.

The BOG vending policy has forced one UMass student vendor to stop selling his tee shirts because he violated the Vendor Table Space Policy. Current policy states that each vendor is assigned one table and is responsible for paying a full fee. The vendor was sharing table space with another vendor and therefore violated the policy, Wohlers said earlier.

In other business, Treasurer Tiziana Rota discussed the current status of the budget, and said everything is "going smoothly." Definite projections have not been determined yet, since the senate is still waiting for figures of the actual number of fee-paying graduate students attending the University.

Near sings of nukes, women

By KATE BUSCH
Collegian Staff

Feminist singer and songwriter Holly Near last night brought an already energized Fine Arts Center crowd alive, interspersing song with social dialogue.

The excitement and the urgency started even earlier, at a Campus Center workshop held by Near and her artistic interpreter Susan Freundlich yesterday afternoon.

The concert, co-sponsored by the Student Coalition Against Nukes Nationwide and Union Program Council was introduced by SCANN member Mary Jane Paika, who stressed the importance of cooperation in the fight against nuclear energy in an opening statement.

Near then opened the concert by applauding with her enthusiastic audience. "I got lots of smiling to do, Thank you," she told the audience, who applauded intermittently throughout the concert. Near said she had been travelling since late August opposing nuclear power, weapons, and what she described as the "nuclear mentality in which the elite few think they can do anything to anybody to make money...

"It is very important for women to be in leadership. As we tear down, we want women to be part of the building," she asserted.

Near sang and related many shocking nuclear-energy related "accidents," accompanied by the voice of piano player J.T. Thomas. She talked about proposed legislation that would "for security reasons" keep communities unaware of proposed transportation of nuclear waste. "It's pretty hard to keep a 100 ton truck a secret," Near told the appreciative crowd.

'Simpson Street'

By KAREN THOMAS
Black Affairs Staff

Bringing an audience of 200 people to their feet, The Puerto Rican Traveling Theatre closed the Third World Theatre Series fall program with their realistic portrayal of a Puerto Rican family in the Bronx, Monday at Bowker Auditorium.

"Simpson Street" proved to be an open realistic view of Puerto Rican life in the city. Covered with profanity and candid speeches, the drama provided a realistic slap in the face. It allowed the viewer to look past the drunken happiness of the scenes and look deep into Puerto Rican pride and agony.

The drama opened with family and friends awaiting the arrival of the son Michael (Freddy Valle) from a mental institution where he was placed for attempted suicide. The mother Lucy, (Anotnia Rey) runs around frantically to prepare for her son's arrival while her daughter (Maria Norman) and neighbors Rosa (Iraida Polanco), Rosa's daughter Sonia (Jeanette Collazo) and Elva (Martha de la Cruz) banter about men and life in general.

When Michael arrives, the play begins to scratch the surface of a much deeper story. Michael's sister Angela has left her husband, the neighbor Elva is an alcoholic, Rosa steals her daughter's boyfriends and Sonia is in love with a college student that isn't Puerto Rican.

One begins to wonder what force keeps Lucy strong, holding her ever-erupting household together. Elva and Rosa constantly verbally punch at each other and Michael is not quite able to stomach all the confusion.

The touching scene between brother and sister brings the close feeling of Puerto Rican kinship. Michael tells his sister that life offers more than dancing and having men buy her drinks. Angela accuses him of still living in the institution, isolated from the facts of life. The bitterness Angela feels is strong, she has been hurt deeply by her husband. But, the bitterness is not directed toward Michael; it is Angela who hugs and wishes him luck when he announces that he is moving to California.

Lucy (Antonia Rey) is overcome with joy when she greets her son Michael (Freddy Valle) as he returns from the mental institution where he was placed for attempted suicide. A neighbor, Rosa (Iraido Polanco) looks on, during the production of Simpson Street which took place Monday evening in Bowker Auditorium. Photo by Ed Cohen

The next scene deepens the frustration of life on Simpson Street. When Lucy is told that Michael is leaving she breaks down and cries. Lucy has poured all her love and devotion into her children after her husband left her. The thought of Michael leaving is too much for her to bear. Lucy tells Michael to get out, grasping to her dignity, but as the lights lower and the production ends, it seems that Lucy's ever-flowing force has been invaded by a wound that just won't heal.

Iranian students threatened by angry mob

(AP) — A taunting crowd of about 200 anti-Iranian protesters, led by two disc jockeys, tore up signs displayed Tuesday by five Iranian students and angrily threatened to declare "open season on camel jockeys."

The students sat quietly on the steps of City Hall, separated from the shouting crowd by only a few feet and a ring of at least 14 police officers.

There were no arrests or injuries.

Tuesday's incident came a day after the five students, from San Antonio College, began a hunger strike to protest city officials' refusal to allow anti-shah parades. City officials fear such demonstrations would lead to violence.

City Council was to consider the students' appeal of that refusal in a special session Tuesday night.

The anti-Iranian crowd was called to City Hall by Ricci Ware and Jud Ashmore, country-western disc jockeys who often use their radio show to speak out on political issues.

Ashmore asked the students, "Would you mind taking your signs and getting the hell out of here?"

When the students refused to answer or leave, Ware stepped forward and ripped up a poster of Iranian leader Ayatollah Ruholla Khomeini. Other members of the crowd surged forward and tore up other antishah, pro-Khomeini signs.

Police moved in, restraining Ware and surrounding the students.

Ware explained how the demonstration came about:

"I was pretty hot Monday after I heard about what they were doing. The more I thought about it, the madder I got. I told Jud about it on the air and we just decided to come down here and invite anybody who wanted to come. These people don't have rights in this country."

Members of the crowd criticized city officials for allowing the students to protest on the steps and for then summoning police to protect them. There is no city ordinance against such protests.

"The lack of official action like this was what gave birth to the vigilantes. It can happen again. A lot of people are talking about it," said Bill Fellers, a leader of the crowd.

Asked if he was threatening physical violence against the Iranians, Fellers replied, "You betcha. I'll personally kick the teeth out of every one of them if I can. I'm sick and tired of this situation."

Harrell Banks, station manager at KBUC, where Ware and Ashmore work, said he had no opinion on the disc jockeys' action. He said he does not tell them what to say on the air, adding they "have a right" to their opinions.

Reader appalled for SCANN

To the Editor:

I'd like to clear up some issues for James Hoodlet, who wrote to say that he was appalled by Mark Anderson's actions at the nuclear debate on Dec. 4. First, I thought Anderson was mature and courteous on the whole and I found the debate very lively and informative.

Second, Hoodlet was mistaken when he called Anderson the "spokesman" for SCANN. SCANN is a completely non-hierarchal, non-bureaucratic organization. No member of SCANN is given the title of spokesperson. Anderson volunteered to present the anti-nuclear case at the debate.

Third, Hoodlet wrote, "I feel this is a sad commentary on the anti-nuclear movement." Since SCANN is just one group in just one country that is fighting nuclear power, the presentation of Dec. 4 cannot be considered representative of the whole anti-nuclear movement. Peace and No Nukes...

Someone out to get you?

To the Editor

The article in Mondays Collegian about rule violations of the zoo mass vendor left a few things out that people should know.

The first day I shared a table space was at the suggestion of the woman who manages the vendor table system, to help someone who lost a space from a scheduling error. Because it worked out so well the other vendor and I continued to do this with the understanding that we would petition the board of governors to endorse table sharing because it allowed more vendors to use the concourse and for more efficient use of space. This is also in line with the vendor policy purpose of making the sale of handcraft and unique items available to the university community. Within three days of our petition, the board responded that they would not endorse table sharing because they felt my motives were not altruistic. At this point I stopped sharing a table space. About a week later I had an argument with the chairman of the board, Michael Herbert over a private agreement. The next day I was told my vending permit had been revoked. When the chancellor was confronted, he was very helpful in setting up an administrative hearing...

Some people say I'm just paranoid when I say that the board is out to get me. However, while the hearing was in session three members of the board approached the person who was selling for me, and harassed her and threatened me with physical harm. I realize that the board is there for truth, justice, and the American way, but, why didn't the other vendor I shared a table with ever hear anything from them?

How does that saying go? Just because you're paranoid doesn't mean they aren't out to get you.

Visitor worried about sexism

To the Editor:

I recently visited UMass as I've done many times before, and every time I visit I become more impressed with the amount of student activity and concern over the conditions in our society.

However, one item never fails to disturb me and I would like to direct it mainly to all the women's organizations on campus.

Like it or not, both men and women have to learn to work together, live together and love together in order to create a better society. This is something either we have forgotten or choose to completely ignore.

There must have been dozens of posters up on bulletin boards everywhere telling of different functions that are being held in benefit of women. They all invited women to come but none mentioned even a word about male participation.

I am just as concerned with the plight of women as anyone can be and I find this type of action very sexist in itself.

It seems no better than the elements we are trying to defeat now. The only exclusion to all of this was a poster by the Health Foods Store in the Student Union regarding the boycotting of the University Store for selling pornographic material.

It had both men and women on it. It is bad enough that it will take years for enough male participation and interest to make things happen on a large scale nationwide. This type of action only makes matters worse.

Believe it or not, there are many men who are concerned with the problems and how to correct them. It would also be a good idea not to make men feel unwanted once they have decided to attend these functions. Don't constantly criticize, but instead talk of ways we could work together to solve the problems facing us.

As I've said before, "We have to learn to work together in order to create a better society."

From here on, I hope all your posters say "open to all concerned." I surely hope this message finds its way to Everywoman's Center at Wilder Hall and I would surely appreciate a return letter from one of its members on their view.

Globe Santa needs help

To the Editor:

Come on UMass let's show we care.

Come down to the C.C. info desk (next to the Blue Wall)

At 7:00 Thursday night.

The UMass Globe Santa Project needs our help

Collecting door to door to raise money to bring

Christmas to the Boston areas' underprivileged children.

Door to door is the most effective way of raising money;

So let's take 2 hours out from studying, and,

Get ourselves down to the C.C. at 7 p.m. Thursday.

It's time for us to do our part this year,

Because, after all Dec. 25th should be Christmas for everyone.

The God Complex

James Lewis

America has got a God complex. This statement was originally stated by the Last Poets.

The reason I say this is because of the repeated mass murder and massacring the United States has done, and the scientific manipulations of human nature of the present. And it doesn't look like the United States has learned from her past.

The United States feels it has the right and the authority to police the world, disrupt other people's cultures and civilizations, mass murder millions of innocent people, and institute their own government, their own values, and their own life styles on other peoples.

People say that this is not unusual, and that other peoples have done it. Get them before they get us. They are no different than we are. They would do it to us if they had the weapons.

Unfortunately, I disagree. This is unprecendented. Other cultures have had huge civilizations (in Africa, Asia and America) and they didn't concentrate their research and development for mass destruction. This is a historical fact. There have been civilizations all over the world on every continent with writing, metalurgy, astronomy, and all kinds of other advances in science, art and technology.

But now we are at a crucial point on planet earth where the world can be blown up with another war, and the United States all but pubicly declared war on Iran. But let's lock at the past, we've been here before.

There were 80 million Native Americans living naturally in America, and they were lied to, diseased and massacred to such a degree that there is not one million Native Americans left in the United States. Unprecedented.

Or how about the big atom bomb on Japan, the one on Hiroshima killing 200,000 persons in less than one minute, 50,000,000 degrees centigrade, 20 square miles.

In the United States, whenever white people begin to get treated like non-white people, they raise the roof. When four students were killed at Kent State for the anti-Vietnam demonstration, within days half a million Americans were demonstrating on Washington. Because a few police entered a few rooms in Southwest, the next week UMass is having rallies and demonstrations. But three black women are brutalized by four police, one black woman found dead in a hotel with five whites, one Hispanic found dead in Washington dorm, one black woman paralyzed for life because of fraternity hell night, and the whites don't understand. In this country of 180 million whites and 35 million blacks and Hispanics, blacks and Hispanics occupy 80 percent of the jails. This means one of two things: Blacks and Hispanics are the only people lying, cheating, stealing, raping and murdering, or, they make laws for blacks and Hispanics to go to jail.

Iran used to export 5.7 million barrels of oil per day to the United States. The Shah was installed by the CIA with the overthrow in 1953. The people resented this, hated the Shah. Anyone speaking against the government would be killed. He is accredited with killing over 100,000 people.

The United States does not care about democracy or the hostages. If the United States cared about the hostages, they would have sent back the Shah, instead of keeping him here. The United States wants the Iranians to do something to the hostages so it can destroy Khomeini and take back the oil. The United States doesn't care if it goes to war, and millions of innocent people are mass murdered.

The United States has never tried to negotiate with Iran. Jimmy Carter made this tremendous multi-billion effort to bring peace between Egypt and Israel and the country is now ready to risk the lives of the hostages and WW III to save face.

The Soviet Union did declare support for Iran through its newspaper, Pravada. If there is a nuclear war, and it could very well happen, the United States and the Soviet Union can atom bomb each other for three solid months, bombs that are 16 times the force of the first atom bomb, Soviet bombs being 10 times stronger than our bombs. Needless to say there would be no ozone left, and no people either.

Scarlet Knights drub cagers

Seeking their first victory of the season, the Minutemen hung close to Rutgers throughout the first half but in the final twenty minute stanza, the Scarlet Knights exerted their superiority and pulled away to a 84-68 victory at the Rutgers Athletic Center in Piscataway, New Jersey.

The action in the first half was close fought. The Minutemen opened up the scoring with freshman forward Danny Wright connecting on a jumpshot to give the Minutemen the early lead.

After trading baskets, Rutgers opened up a 10-4 advantage on consecutive baskets, two by senior guard Daryl Strickland. With the score 12-8 in favor of the Scarlet Knights, the men from New Jersey got the better side of an 8-2 scoring outburst, extending their margin to 19-10.

But by the 9:30 mark of the period, UMass cut the lead to three on consecutive hoops by Curtis Phauls, Bill Morrison (on a goaltending call on Rutger's Kelvin Troy), and Phauls again.

The Minutemen managed to shave the Rutgers lead down to a single point, 21-20, on back-to-back baskets by George Dennerlein (eight first half points).

With about three minutes remaining in the first half, the Scarlet Knights put on a mini-surge to open the game up in their favor, 38-29. The Knights surge consisted of nine unanswered points, six by guard Darius Griffin.

Minutemen rookie Pedro de la Cruz knotted the final basket of the half after grabbing an offensive rebound to make the halftime score Rutgers 38 UMass 31.

The outset of the second half saw Rugers up the lead to 11 points, 44-33, and extend it to 13, 50-37 on a Roy Hinson jumper.

Hinson collected 10 second half points (16 on the night), including three slam dunks.

With the score 59-53 in favor of the Knights, Rutgers went on a scoring spree to open up a 67-53 advantage, but the Minutemen came right back with seven points of their own to cut the score to Rutgers 69 UMass 60.

But Rutgers was not to be had, eventually opening up an 18 point margin at 82-64, and cruising home with an 84-68 victory.

Curtis Phauls led UMass with 18 points, George Dennerlein added 17. Kelvin Troy led Rutgers with 19.

Matmen lose close match to cadets

By DONNA SULLIVAN
Collegian Staff

West Point, N.Y. – The Army Cadets ruined what started out as a perfect season with a win over the matmen here last night.

"I though we would do better – I expected to beat these guys," said Coach Dave Amato. "We lost all of the close matches," he said.

118 pound Rich Schiarizzi won the first match of the meet with a close one over Bob Turner. Schiarizzi placed fourth in the Coast Guard and Morgan State Tournaments and won his last time out at Mass. Maritime.

Dana Rasmussen saw his first bout of the year, and wrestled in the 126 pound weight class. To get down to the weight, Rasmussen has reportedly run fifteen miles in two days. Rasmussen was unsuccessful his first time out though losing a close one to Army's Mark Palzer.

Kevin Murphy kept his perfect season going with a 9-3 win over Ed Wohlwender. Wohlwender, who has been having a good season, was stifled with Murphy's quickness and consistency.

Minutewomen edge URI WRams, 76-75

By DANNY GUIDERA
Collegian Staff

KINGSTON, RI – Val DePaolo hit two free throws with two seconds remaining on the clock to provide the margin of victory as the Minutewomen held off a late rally by the University of Rhode Island to down the WRams 76-75.

The win was particularly sweet coming on the heels of Monday night's heartbreaking loss to Texas AM when the Aggies nipped the Minutewomen at the buzzer.

"No question about it," said Minutewomen coach Mary Ann Ozdarski of the game's lift to team morale. "These kids have got heart, what else could you ask for."

Julie Ready led Minutewomen scorers with 23 points and 15 rebounds followed by guard Sue Peters with 13 points and nine rebounds. Guard DePaolo socred 13 points and Ginger Legare netted all of her 11 points in the second half.

The game was tied at halftime 36-36 with neither team taking the upper hand. A second half flurry spurred by the passing of Sherry Collins put the Minutewomen up by as much as nine early in the second stanza. The WRams fought back on the shooting of Naomi Graves (18 points) and Kim Dick who notched 26 points to take the lead at 75-74 with 17 seconds remaining. Guard Peters brought the ball upcourt, passed to Tricia Corcoran (six points), and then to DePaolo who was fouled by URI's Graves. After she sank both shots, the WRams could not get the ball downcourt in time as the clock ran out.

A long, long time ago...

(The words in italics are sung to the tune of Don McLean's American Pie).

A long, long time ago, I can still remember how my column used to make me smile.
I knew if I had my chance that I could grasp the reader's glance and maybe they'd be happy for a while.
But, graduation made me shiver, with every column I delivered;
sports news on the doorstep, I couldn't take one more step.
I don't know if I'll be sad when I write the column I once had, but something will touch me deep inside the day my column dies.

Well, here it is folks, my final column. It's hard to believe that three years of writing sports for the Collegian has come to an end. It seems like yesterday I brought my first article down to this now all too familiar office. From writing features to covering a beat to writing a weekly column, these three years have been anything but boring. Especially my tenure this semester as co-sports editor with Steve Zack, the whole experience has been unforgetable.

What kind of memories does a college sports writer have?

First, there are the athletes. Writing about the athletes that represent the University in intercollegiate competition is a more difficult job than you can imagine. Sometimes it's hard to make the distinction from being a cheerleader to being an objective sportswriter. It's a job that requires tact, patience, and a skill that takes years to develop. But, the athletes here at UMass have proven themselves to be a classy breed time and time again, fighting the apathy and lack of support from fans that has plagued their teams at this state university. People like Alex Eldridge and Dennis Dent who provided many thrills will not fade fast from my memory.

Then, there are the coaches and people like UMass Sports InformationDirector (SID) Dick Page who have made my job that much easier. I can honestly say that the coaches here have done their best to help the press in any way they could. Tops on my list are football coach Bob Pickett who put up with a lot of dumb questions and soccer mentor Russ "Cap" Kidd who has done an incredible job working with the always lacking budget he receives here. SID Page has announced his retirement at the end of next semester and I wish him all the luck in the future. A firmly established fixture here, Page will be the one they compare to the rest of the SID's.

Last, but not least, there are the people I've worked with here at the Collegian office. This place and the people were a lot of things to me; they were an education and they were friends. When I first started writing, it was something that I did in my spare time. Now, I build my whole life on it and hope to find a career in it. The faces, the names, and the good times along with the bad have made a lasting impression on me that I believe has made me a better man. No longer will the flourescent lights of the Collegian office bear down on me late at night, urging me to meet a deadline. No longer will I ever find myself working this hard for no pay. I think I'm gonna miss it.

So bye-bye to the Collegian tribe. Drove my Pinto to the levy but the levy was dry.
Then good 'ol writers were drinking whiskey and rye.
Singin' this'll be the day my column dies.
This'll be the day my column dies.

Bonds lock up building funds

This is one of two stories in todays Collegian concluding a five-part series dealing with campus building problems.

While the Physical Plant cries out for a bigger Operating Budget to repair faulty construction and design defects, the UMass Building Authority is sitting on $2,740,500 in excess reserve and construction funds.

According to a report by the University's auditing firm, Peat, Marwick, Mitchell and Co., the building authority has $1,791,500 in excess construction funds and $949,000 in excess reserve funds.

Legal Services Office employees, Michael Pill and Charles DiMare, in a letter Nov. 19 to Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs Dennis Madson, suggested "students and staff work together to obtain these building authority funds.

"Those funds," they said, "represent an alternative to an inadequate legislative appropriation and student rental fees that are at the breaking point."

Director of the Office of Residential Resource Management Robert L. Campbell also sent a memorandum to Madson requesting the authority's excess funds be delivered to the University for use in reduction of the debt service requirement. More student money for repairs could then be directly applied to the correction of original construction and design defects.

The debt service requires 29 percent of student rent and fees be used to pay off construction bonds, interest due the bond holders and any fees incurred in the handling of the bond issue.

Excess construction funds "are the change left over from each construction project," according to General Counsel and Assistant Secretary Treasurer of the building authority Morris Goldings.

Goldings said the excess money is a result of interest accrued on the reserve fund. According to state law, the authority must create a reserve fund equal to the amount of rent collected from student fees in one year. This is to insure payments can be made on a building closed for an extended period of time. The reserve is accumulated by collecting thirteen months' rent each year for twelve years.

The building authority sells bonds to pay for the cost of construction of each project. Goldings said the excess reserve and construction funds will be used to pay off these bonds a few years prior to their maturity, another 15 or 20 years in most cases.

When asked why these funds would be used to retire the bonds early instead of being put to use now at the University, Goldings said, "According to the Management and Services Agreement (an agreement drawn up between the authority and the University stating the University's responsibility to maintain the project, ordinary maintenance must be paid for through students fees."

Goldings went on to say, however, that the Building Authority has used excess construction money for certain major expenditures that were not ordinary repair.

The Office of Residential Management and Services requests do not deal with ordinary maintenance but rather with "correcting original construction and design defects," which would be a major expenditure.

Campbell said the much needed additional lighting on campus could be considered a major expenditure. "However I would not want to restrict the use of those funds to the inside of the buildings considering the amount of work needed in them," he said.

When specifically addressing the $949,000 in excess reserve funds which come directly from student fees, Goldings said, "It is the opinion of our bond counsel (a financial advisor hired by the authority) that the money (the excess) was anticipated to be an extra reserve for the protection of the bond holders."

Michael Pill, a member of the Iowa Bar Association, said, "The Legal Services Office is planning to raise the matter formally with Austin Broadhurst (Authority bond counsel) to get him to document the legal authority the UMBA uses to to support any claim they may have to it (the excess money) or to secure from him an opinion releasing the funds."

Pill said legislation is also a possibility. "Perhaps an amendment to section 10, the statute that provides for a reserve fund, requiring that all funds in excess of the exact required reserve be either applied to debt service, which would free up an equal amount of student fees to be used by the University, or turned over to the University directly."

Commission lists problems

By GARY RANDALL
Collegian Staff

While UMass students have been studying without the use of the library, a special state commission has been studying the state agency responsible for building it and many other buildings on campus plagued with construction problems.

The commission released a report yesterday that may eliminate future construction problems, if accepted by the legislature.

The Bureau of Building Construction (BBC), headed by Stuart Lesser since January, oversees the construction of all buildings on campus which are funded by the state. It was responsible for the construction of the University Library, the Whitmore Administration Building, the Tilson Farms Steam Plant and the Graduate Research Center, all of which have been plagued with construction problems since their building.

The library was closed in August because its brick facade is crumbling. The Tilson heating plant worked only eight months before it broke down completely in 1974. Poor ventilation systems in Whitmore and the Graduate Towers have been the source of numerous employee health problems.

The Ward Commission

Building construction problems at UMass are not unique. Construction problems in all state buildings became serious enough in 1977 for the state legislators to create a special commission charged with investigating state building contracts and proposing legislation to improve the system.

The Special Commission Concerning State and Country Buildings (known as the Ward Commission after its director John William Ward, former president of Amherst College) convened in January, and released a critical report on the BBC last Wednesday.

The Ward Commission charged the BBC with inaccurate cost estimates, shoddy selection of contractors and inexpertise.

In an interview last week, Lesser defended the BBC. "In private industries construction problems happen all the time," he said. "You just don't read about them. I don't know for sure, but I think the ratio between construction problems in the public and private building sectors are the same, or close to it."

Lesser said the lack of routine maintenance is the cause of most construction problems. "Maintenance is poorly done and underfunded," he said. "That is a lack of common sense. If maintenance was properly funded, a lot of

Senate votes to allow DVP admission fees

By ED LEVINE
Collegian Staff

The Distinquished Visitors Program may now charge admission fees to its events, due to an amendment approved by the Undergraduate Student Senate last night.

The amendment to the DVP constitution would allow the organization to charge an admission fee when costs of a program run high. The amendment, which was passed by a vote of 28 to 14, limits the charge to $5.

The present DVP constitution does not allow admission charges at events, DVP president Joel Weissman said. He added speaker costs have risen and the organization should be permitted to assess charges.

"We cannot afford to bring in a lot of speakers," Weissman said. "The Student Government Association is not in a position to give us any more money, this is the only way we can go."

When DVP was first established by the UMass Board of Trustees in 1959, the organization was budgeted annually at $3 per student, but the following year the figure was cut back to $1.50, Weissman said. DVP has not had an increase since that time, he said.

Concerned that many students would not be able to afford admission charges, SGA co-President Brian Burke failed in attempt to limit the charge to $3. Burke said he would accept the amendment as passed, but called the senate's action a "mistake."

SGA co-President Rich LaVoice said he might ask for the question to be put out to referendum by the students.

"It's about time we trust someone," said former senate speaker David Barenberg. "We've trusted this group in the past and they have done a good job. We should trust them now."

Echoing Barenberg's comment, SGA treasurer William Fitzgerald said the Union Program Council, which produces concerts at UMass is "one of the most efficient groups on campus. We trust them to charge reasonable admission, I can't see why we don't give DVP the same flexibility."

U.S. expels 183 Iran diplomats

By ROBERT C. CULLEN
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The State Department yesterday ordered the expulsion of 183 Iranian diplomats from the United States within five days.

The order made it clear that the action was being taken as a result of the continuing crisis in which Iranian militants have held 50 Americans hostage in Tehran since Nov. 4.

State Department spokesman Thomas Reston stressed that the United States is not breaking diplomatic relations with Iran and said there are no plans to order the Iranians to close their embassy in Washington or their consulates in four other cities.

Undersecretary of State David Newsom called Iranian Charge d'Affaires Ali Agah to the State Department yesterday afternoon to deliver the order to sharply reduce the number of Iranian diplomats.

Reston described the move as one of a series of "measured steps" to demonstrate American concern over the holding of the American hostages in Tehran.

He did not indicate that the department thought the action would result in the release of the hostages.

"We don't know what will lead to their release," Reston said. "We want to bring Iran to the point of seeing that releasing them is in their interest."

The order requires Iran to reduce its staff at the embassy in Washington from 57 to 15. Consulates in New York, Chicago, Houston and San Francisco will have to reduce their combined staffs of 161 to five at each location, Reston said.

The Iranians will be able to choose which diplomats to keep in the United States and which to send home, Reston said. Officials said they must complete the pruning of the staff within five days.

Until yesterday's action, the Iranian embassy and the consulates had been allowed to operate normally since the militants in Tehran seized the U.S. Embassy and demanded that the United States return the deposed Shah of Iran for trial.

Administration officials had been saying for days that President Carter had a number of options available to him in an effort to increase pressure on Iran and that the options would be used over a period of days or weeks.

Most officials had indicated the options most likely to be taken would involve some form of economic reprisal against the Iranian government, which has supported the militant takeover of the U.S. Embassy in Tehran.

Officials said the option of ordering Iranian diplomats to leave the country had also been on the administration's list of contingency plans for some time.

San Antonio police yesterday bodily removed from the steps of the city hall five Iranian students who were staging a sit-in hunger strike in protest of the presence of the deposed shah at Lackland Air Force Base. Protestors were also denied request for a parade permit. (AP Laserphoto)

Kennedy denies letter of praise to Ayatollah

By DONALD M. ROTHBERG
Associated Press

BOSTON — Sen. Edward M. Kennedy yesterday branded as "a total fabrication" a laudatory letter that Iranian officials allege he sent to Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini.

En route from Washington to Boston fundraiser, Kennedy dismissed Iranian Foreign Minister Sadegh Ghotbzadeh's contention that the letter was genuine.

Kennedy also said he does not believe the Iranian crisis will be a decisive issue in the presidential campaign.

"Economic issues decide elections," said the Massachusetts senator, who is challenging President Carter for the 1980 Democratic Party presidential nomination. "They'll decide this one," he added.

Kennedy made the comment when asked for his reaction to recent polls showing that since the Iranian crisis, Carter's popularity has soared. A Gallup poll made public yesterday showed Carter leading Kennedy as well as all potential Republican presidential candidates.

The alleged letter or telegram from Kennedy to Khomeini surfaced in the news reports surfacing in Tehran early yesterday.

Kennedy's office quickly disclaimed the communication.

Kennedy repeatedly has expressed support for Carter's efforts to win release of the 50 Americans held hostage in the U.S. Embassy in Tehran.

But the senator touched off sharp criticism when he called the deposed Shah Mohammad Reza Pahlavi a cruel despot and questioned whether the shah should be granted asylum in the United States.

After his remarks about the shah drew adverse reaction, Kennedy emphasized that he did not believe anything the shah had done justified the occupation of the American embassy and the taking of hostages.

He also has strongly criticized Khomeini.

Kennedy interrupted his presidential campaigning to return to Washington for two votes on the "windfall profits" tax bill.

The senator joined the 53-44 majority that defeated a move to kill an amendment aimed at strengthening the tax. That vote placed him in agreement with Carter, who lobbied strongly to muster votes in support of the amendment.

After the vote to save the amendment succeeded, Senate Majority Leader Robert C. Byrd, D-W.Va., tried to get an agreement for quick action on its adoption, but he failed.

Among other things, the letter had Kennedy expressing support for Khomeini and saying: "I will give my blood for you ... We have decided to proclaim our support for you since we understand your teachings and beliefs."

The first reaction came from Kennedy's administrative assistant, Richard Burke, who said, "The senator has had no contact whatsoever with anyone in the Iranian government — especially a letter being sent to the ayatollah."

An official at the Iranian Foreign Ministry also called the letter a fake, but her statement was contradicted later by Ghotbzadeh.

"We received such a telegram and sent it to Khomeini," the foreign minister said in a radio interview.

In Washington, the State Department, meantime called the supposed letter a "bald, crude, amusing fake."

An Iranian Embassy spokesman in Washington, Hussein Ava, also said the letter was a fake.

"There was a telex sent to Immam Khomeini in Sen. Kennedy's name," he said. "We believe it was a fake and we are investigating to try to find out who was responsible."

The alleged letter was the latest example of the Iranian crisis dogging Kennedy's effort to challenge President Carter for the Democratic Party's 1980 presidential nomination.

Defense spending boosturged

WASHINGTON (AP) — President Carter, in his first policy address since the Iranian crisis began, is proposing a five-year boost in defense spending to meet Soviet challenges and allow a quicker U.S. reaction in remote trouble spots.

White House press secretary Jody Powell said Carter's speech yesterday to a prestigious business audience in the White House East Room was not prompted by events in Iran.

But Powell acknowledged Iran could have an impact on "the attitudes and perceptions of the American public." He said winning public support for a bigger defense budget might be easier because of the continuing Iranian crisis.

Powell alsosaid the president would not focus on detailed figures but would stress "where we stand (on defense) and where we believe we should go over the next several years."

Iran looks to a federal govt.

TEHRAN, Iran (AP) — Plagued by renewed outbreaks of dissent from ethnic Turks at home as it confronts the United States abroad, Iran expects to move toward a federal-type constitution as soon as possible, a senior official said yesterday.

The announcement at a news conference by Justice Minister Mohammad Beheshti followed nearly a week of rebellion in the northwest Azerbaijan region, home of the Azari Turks who comprise nearly a quarter of Iran's 35 million people.

Iranian leaders appeared in no hurry to fulfill repeated promises of Foreign Minister Sadegh Ghotbzadeh that 50 American hostages, now in their sixth week of captivity, will be allowed regular visitors.

Columbian quake wreaks havoc

BOGOTA, Colombia (AP) — A powerful earthquake rolling through the Colombia-Ecuador border zone before dawn yesterday leveled homes and touched off tidal waves, killing at least 118 persons and injuring more than 350, officials said.

Rescue teams said searchers were probing rubble in six flattened southern Colombian coastal cities, and they feared the toll could go much higher since many persons were missing.

Although most of the deaths were reported in Narino, the quake awoke residents over a wide area of neighboring Ecuador and reached 300 miles east to Bogota, where tall buildings swayed.

Hardest hit by the earthquake was Charco, a Colombian fishing village of 4,000, where police said at least 62 persons were killed and more than 350 were injured.

Park's assassin arrested

Associated Press

SEOUL, South Korea — Martial-law commander Chung Seung-hwa and several other generals were arrested yesterday in connection with the assassination of President Park Chung-hee, the government announced.

Informed sources said Chung was arrested after an hour-long gun battle outside his home in which four of his personal guards were wounded. The government described it as a minor clash that occurred when investigators went to Chung's home to question him.

Defense Minister Ro Jaehyun on Thursday issued a statement saying new facts had been uncovered implicating Chung and the other military men in the president's killing.

Engineers halt river plan

SPRINGFIELD, Mass. (AP) — The U.S. Army Corps of Engineers has withdrawn its support of a plan to divert water from the Connecticut River to Quabbin Reservoir.

The Metropolitan District Commission had proposed the diversion to help provide drinking water for eastern Massachusetts residents.

In overruling the corps' report endorsing the proposal, the federal Office of the Secretary to the Army cited a lack of local interest, and disagreement by Massachusetts and Connecticut.

Joseph Ignazzio, chief of the corps' river basin planning section in Waltham, said yesterday he was informed by letter that the secretary's office has decided the project "is not appropriate for consideration for federal involvement," and should be accomplished by local or state initiative if at all.

MBTA faces Xmas closing

BOSTON (AP) — The country's oldest transit system, Boston's MBTA, faces a shutdown a week before Christmas in a battle of wills between its administration and the community leaders who pay the freight for the aging trolleys and buses.

Robert Foster, chairman of the Massachusetts Bay Transportation Authority, says the transit system is nearly broke and won't be able to make the Dec. 20 payroll unless the MBTA advisory board comes up with a $15 million emergency allocation.

But the MBTA advisory board, which represents the 79 towns served by the transit network, says Foster won't get another penny from them and blames the crisis on its "senior management."

Who was Seta Rampersad?

Editor's Note: The following is the fourth installment of a five-part series examining the death of Seta T. Rampersad, a 20-year-old UMass student whose death last year spurred community concern when an inquest concluded no criminal negligence was involved.

This series was compiled by Betty Ciolek, Lee Goodwin, Darlene Lorkiewicz, Serena Richard and Robert E. Stein.

Before Seta Rampersad came to the University of Massachusetts as a political science major, she lived in Milton, Mass. She graduated from Girls' High School in Roxbury in 1974. "She was really quiet, and smart as hell," according to classmate Judy Jones.

Jones, who also attended UMass with Rampersad, said when she arrived "Seta started out quiet and then all of a sudden she started hanging out and going to parties, which she never did before."

A friend who lived with her in Leech House in the Northeast living area of the University described Rampersad as attractive. "Her social life did not center around the dorm. The only time we ever saw her were when she'd come to our door and ask how something looked on her," she said.

"She was really self-conscious about her body, always insecure on how she came across to other people," said another friend who met Rampersad when she was a 16-year-old freshman.

"She was into partying, going got disco dancing when it wasn't even hip yet. But she was really well-mannered," he said.

One of five children, Rampersad was born in Trinidad, the West Indies, and was an infant when she came to this country. In a recent telephone interview, her mother, Pearl, said Seta was a financial aid student who, "was working to try to pay her way."

Pearl Rampersad talked slowly at the beginning of the interview, asking more questions than she answered. Her speech quickened as she began talking about the possible re-opening of her daughter's case.

"We will do anything to find out what realy happened; so far nobody really knows," Mrs. Rampersad said.

According to the Third World Woman's Task Force, Brian Pitzer, Carol Newton and Demetrious Konstanlopulos testified that for the twelve hours Rampersad was allegedly sick, they never attempted to get medical assistance for her.

"If she was a good enough friend to go out to party with, why was she not a good enough friend to help? He (Konstanlopulos) should be manly enough to hold responsibility. He should be in a home somewhere, he may go about hurting other people. They should be put in an electric chair. They should be tied to a chair in a room and have their toenails pulled out, to let them feel how other people feel," said Mrs. Rampersad.

Mrs. Rampersad continued, "We are not black and we are not white. We are West Indian. If there were three black people in the room and the girl was white, would it have been handled this way?." The interview ended when Mrs. Rampersad began to cry and said, "I can't say any more," and hung up.

According to classmate Judy Jones, "She liked fair-skinned men. She didn't think

GOING IN STYLE — The typical formal dress attire of the early 18th century was English silk and lace as this mannequin in Historic Deerfield's Fabric Hall is wearing. Historic Deerfield, about 10 miles from UMass in Deerfield, is a mile of 17th and 18th century homes maintained as museums. Deerfield was the last outpost on New England's frontier when it was settled in 1669. It was devastated by the Bloody Brook Massacre of 1675 and again by the Deerfield Massacre of 1704. Lingering LPs delay change in music of the seventies

By PERRY ADLER
Collegian Staff

If the previous decade was the Swinging 60's, then, musically speaking, this one was the Stagnant 70's.

To understand why so much less seemed to happen in American popular music this decade, it is necessary to go back to the end of the last decade for the root of the problem. The crucial occurrence was the change from singles to albums as the dominant record format. While this had some positive aspects, such as freeing musicians from the necessity of keeping their work short and to the point, and freeing stoned listeners from the necessity of getting out of their seats every few minutes, overall it had a severely negative impact.

When 45s were the thing, when you heard a song you liked you bought it; it didn't matter whether or not you were familiar with the artist because you knew exactly what you were getting. And because singles were, and are, inexpensive, you could buy many of them and support several artists at once.

With albums, the required investment is much greater, so people's buying patterns have become much more conservative. Though more people are buying records now, they buy fewer per person on the average. And because they seldom have the opportunity to absorb an entire LP before purchase, they tend to play it safe. They stick to artists they already know, or at best, new ones whose style is not very new. "Album-oriented radio exacerbates the problem by pandering to the public's cowardice. It also slowed the turnover of individual records as well as artists, since albums usually have more than one playable song and so their hit lifespans can be stretched out much longer than a single's can.

All of this has resulted in the fossilizing of the audience's tastes, the lessening of the excitement in the music scene, and the decrease of the importance of music in most people's lives. It is significant that both of the main challenges to the mainstream, disco and New Wave, owe much of their vitality to their strong connections to the singles medium. New Wave in particular relies on the low cost of production as well as purchase of singles. So, if record companies consider it too risky to record an album by an artist, the artist can put out a single independently. It is also significant that the decade has been much more exciting in England because singles haven't lost their importance over there. A whole series of 45-centered genres, from punk to glitter to reggae, have been able to flourish.

The musical events of 1979 make sense when one views them in light of the trends of the decade as a whole. The year began with the illusion that a complete takeover of the charts by disco was imminent. But suddenly disco faded, as it became clear that such a limited style could not last. The middle of the year saw a whole slew of new rock artists score in the marketplace and it appeared that New Wave, in some form or other, was making it at last. But the end of the year saw the revenge of the old guard, as long-awaited LP's from Led Zeppelin, the Eagles and Fleetwood Mac re-established the dominance of the superstars. They sold in far greater quantities than disco (Saturday Night Fever fluke excepted) or New Wave had in their absence. History has shown that it didn't matter what was on these records; once an act makes

Women: Issues in the Eighties

By VICKI CROKE
Special to the Collegian

"I think that the Equal Rights Amendment might pass in the 80's, but I'd rather it didn't" said Vanessa Place, a staff member at the UMass Lesbian Union. Place waited for a reaction before continuing.

"The ERA is merely a pacification device. It's degrading to have to beg our Founding Fathers for our rights. It's patronizing...ERA is a step forward, but if we don't have that step we can make a leap" she said.

Place was one of 11 campus women interviewed by The Collegian about the shape the women's movement may take in the 80's.

Sally Grimes, Associate Professor in the Journalism Dept., on the other hand, said, "We got a good start, but I won't be comfortable until the ERA is passed...The women's movement is far from reaching its goals."

And Jonnetta Cole of Anthropology said she doesn't even believe that a "single monolithic structure called the 'women's movement' exists." She said goals for women in the 80's should be the same as those for men. "Racism is deep in this country and there is nothing which makes women genetically immune to that," she said. She would like to see "a move toward a more egalitarian society, without racism, without sexism, and without a people divided because of class differences."

The focus for the 80's, most women agreed, should be on racism and sexual preference.

Margo Culley of the English Dept., who will be teaching a course in the fall on women in the 80's, said, "The white women's movement has not been sufficiently aware of the problems for black women...and women have been separating themselves from each other due to sexual preference. It is a real mistake to use these issues to divide women from women."

Barbara Love, an associate professor in the School of Education, said she would like to see "a sophistication of understanding" toward black and other Third World women, and understanding through which white women would be required to "deal with their racism-not as a charity, but as a matter of their own liberation."

Place sees the issue of sexual preferences as "one of the biggies in the 80's." She said that the idea of sexual

Star Trek hits screen at warp speed

By ED LEVINE
Collegian Staff

Ten years later the Starship Enterprise returns to save the Federation. This time however, the drama is played out on the big screen. Star Trek-The Motion Picture has finally arrived.

This motion picture is perhaps the most anxiously awaited film in many years. Trekkies have been talking about the film for months. The budget was astronomical (pun-intended)--rumored to be close to $40 million. Trekkies should not be dissapointed in this film; the money was well spent.

Ten years have passed since "Star Trek" left the airwaves. Captain James T. Kirk has been promoted to Admiral. Mr. Spock has returned to his native Vulcan to study the teachings of his planet's elders. Dr. "Bones" McCoy has retired and returned to earth. The rest of the old crew has remained on the Enterprise as its refitted and updated to include the latest technology.

An alien menace is racing across the galaxy bound for Earth. It has just destroyed a Klingon fleet and crossed into Federation territory. Only one ship, one crew, can stop the menace.

Captain Kirk returns to the Enterprise for the first time in years. Spock returns from his home planet. McCoy is "drafted" and also returns. The entire original cast has returned and together set off to intercept the alien.

The U.S.S. Enterprise is newer, bigger, faster and more powerful than ever. The exterior of the ship appears in greater detail than ever before. The bridge, engine room, transporter room, and virtually every other area of the ship have all been redesigned. The Enterprise is all new and ready for its mission.

The special effects, created by Douglas Trumbull and John Dykstra are superb, and some are breathtaking.

The performances of the major characters are as good as expected. William Shatner, as Kirk, is superb. He acts and looks like the admiral and seasoned veteran he is supposed to be. Shatner appears a bit arrogant and edgy which easily could be attributed to his promotion and lack of active duty.

Leonard Nimoy, as Spock, is marvelous. At first as the stern-faced, emotionless Vulcan,and slowly relaxes and allows his human half to show through. Deforrest Kelley as the cynical Dr. McCoy gave perhaps the weakest performance of all. His lines seemed forced, as if he were struggling to get back into the McCoy role. But this shortcoming can be overlooked, as it is eclipsed by all other aspects of the movie.

Jimmy Doohan, Chief engineer Scotty, is also right on target with his previous performances. As worried as ever about the Enterprise, one still gets the impression he really loves the ship. Lt. Uhura, Ensign Checkov, Sulu, and Nurse Chapel, portrayed by Nichelle Nichols, Walter Koenig, George Takei, and Majel Barrett respectively, are all as they used to be. Although their roles were minor in the film, they were there, acting as they were supposed to, the way one would expect things to be.

The story and script are like an original episode. There is depth to the story, and it mercifully does not get bogged down in introducing and developing the characters. One senses the threat of the alien's presence, and feels the tension the crew of the Enterprise feels. Fortunately, nothing has changed.

Trekkies will flock to this film in droves. They should not be dissapointed. Star Trek-The Motion Picture, already destined to be a commercial success, appears headed for artistic success as well. The Enterprise should return, as the film's ending suggests, and will be anxiously awaited.

Goin' fishin'...

Today's mild weather made it a great day for fishing. Anglers Richard Gillerman, Glenn Lyle, and Dave Rowell take to the campus pond hoping for a big goldfish catch. The trio netted a total of three goldfish, each about six inches long, which will be used for research in sub-sensory physiology. (Staff photos by Richard Newman.)

Porno: Harmless erotic fantasies or violence against women?

By JOAN MCKENZIE
Collegian Staff

Editors Note: In response to the Women's March Against Pornography in New York City on Oct. 20, reporter Joan McKenzie conducted a series of interviews attempting to define pornography and to understand local feelings about this controversial medium. This article includes interviews of leaders of the March, student leaders, a reverend, a psychologist, and UMass student who founded an organization to show pornographic films on campus.

Pornography is "aggression in the guise of sex," according to Lynn Campbell, founder of Women Against Pornography and organizer of the march of about 5,000 protestors. Reknowned activist-feminist, founder and editor of M.S. Magazine, Gloria Steinem said "pornography is the result of profound inequalities between men and women."

At the rally in Bryant Park, which followed the march, author and activist-feminist Andrea Dworkin said, "There are those who say pornography is fantasy. But what part is fantasy? The fantasy is that women want to be abused. The lawyers, legislators, scientists and theologins read pornography and say it is so. Men believe the pornography and do not believe the women who say no."

Mannie Ortiz, a male resident of Manhattan who joined the march, pointed out a storefront which read, "Harem Advertising Sex Show."

"For three dollars you could pay to see kids doing sex acts," he said. "They show three movies in a row, then during intermission kids perform live sex acts on stage."

"The pay is there." Ortiz continued. Pornography affects the wife at home with two kids. If a woman needs money she can come down to 42nd. Whatever you want you can get on 42nd St. If you have the money. Ortiz said there are about 20 places on 42nd and 5th Streets where sex and violence are available.

But some say there is a difference between pornography and violence that the two are unrelated.

UMass student Albert Sparks said pornography relieves men who are unsuccessful with women and therefore halts potential rapists. Sparks founded Baroque Enterprises in 1977, a now defunct organization which brought pornographic films to campus. According to Sparks, Baroque Enterprises was founded to "promote a cultural awareness." The organization was responsible for the controversial showing of Deep throat. Although Baroque Enterprises is defunct, Sparks said he still shows pornographic movies on campus for stag shows and private screenings.

"Movies shown on campus have never depicted women being raped or mutilated...Never depicted women being tied up, beaten, or all that other stuff. There is not one violent scene in Deep Throat. Pornography is explicit sex between men and women. That's it. There is no violence in pornography." Sparks said.

"Women are angry because pornography shows women having sex indiscriminately with people they do not know," he said. Pornography or explicit sex would have the same effect on women as it does on men, if women did not have this thing that they should not have indiscriminate sex with people. That's what the whole thing boils down to. Women have been programmed through social conditioning not to go to bed with just anyone."

Sparks also said a movie does not have to be X-rated to have a naked woman in it. "Why do you think there are no R-rated movies showing frontal nudity of men? It's because men make the laws concerning what will be shown. These men have girlfriends and wives. If they showed men with a 10-inch penis while they're sitting at home with a two-inch penis their wives would see something was wrong."

Northampton psychiatrist R.H. Turcotte said it is "important to understand" that "sex and violence are two separate and distinct spheres of emotionality."

"Sexual excitement and experience is something completely distinct and different from the emotions leading to violence." he said. "One may see a connection between the two because these two can overlap and seem to be casually related to each other--violence-sex, sex-violence. They are not related to each other, though the concepts of sadism or masochism are valid concepts."

"The connection occurs only in sickness, only in she was black."

"She used to like to go out with men who came here for the conferences," said a former co-worker in the Campus Center Hotel, where Rampersad was employed for a short while.

On the night of her death, after taking a shower with three other people at the motel, Newton said, "She (Rampersad) said to me that she had never done anything like this before."

Demetrious Konstanlopulos, also known as Jimmy the Greek, has owned and managed the Castaway Lounge for the past five years. He has been married for three and a half years.

During the inquest, Konstanlopulos said he snorted cocaine before Rampersad's death. He also described Rampersad as "short and very attractive" and referred to her as "the girl", during the testimony.

He said it occurred to him during the night that Rampersad might need a doctor, but he didn't call one. Konstanlopulos did not speak to police until they contacted him the day of Rampersad's death.

"I didn't want to get involved; the fact that I'm married and afraid my wife would know," he said at the inquest.

the inquest worked at the Veteran's Administration Hospital in Northampton as a psychiatric nursing assistant. A reformed alcoholic, he testified that the night Rampersad died was the first time he had taken a drink in four years.

Newton lives in Easthampton and was working as a cook at Northampton State Hospital. The night preceding Rampersad's death, Newton was already in bed at 11:30 when Pitzer called her with an invitation to go out for drinks, according to testimony.

Tommorrow the Collegian will trace community reaction in the past year to the closing of the Rampersad inquest in the final part of the five part series.

NATO places missiles to 'counter Soviets'

By ARTHUR L. GAVSHON
Associated Press

BRUSSELS, Belgium — The NATO allies decided yesterday to counter the Soviet military threat by placing hundreds of U.S.-made nuclear missiles in Western Europe, linked to a proposal for new talks on arms control with the Soviet bloc.

As a result of the meeting, 464 American medium-range Tomahawk cruise missiles and 108 Pershing II rocket launchers will be placed in Europe when deployment begins in 1983.

The missiles, most of which will be deployed in Britain, Italy and West Germany, will act as a counter to Eastern European-based Soviet SS-20 triple-warhead nuclear missiles that can hit most cities in Western Europe.

The official Soviet new agency Tass called the agreement "a decision dangerous for the cause of peace and international detente" and said it was the result of "the crude pressure of Washington."

Holland argued for arms control talks before the missiles are deployed, and some support for its proposal was reported from Belgium, Denmark and Norway. Holland and Belgium, which were to have taken 48 missiles each, declined to do so for the moment and may compel NATO to place those missiles elsewhere.

Dutch defense minister Willem Scholten said his country will make a final decision in two years and Belgium is to decide in six months.

Tass contended the Brussels meeting took place "in an atmosphere of unprecedented pressure" on government leaders and parliaments of countries unenthusiastic about the arms-upgrading plan.

"The decision taken in Brussels demonstrates that NATO is speeding up implementation of dangerous plans for further escalation of the arms race in Europe, fraught with the growth of tension and heightening confrontation," it said.

it that big, it takes a while for their popularity to fade. So it was proven that new trends can still gain a foothold only in the absence of the established stars. When the old stars' absences become permanent, the new acts may then become the new establishment.

In the 80's then, as album prices continue to rise, we can expect a continuation of the slow evolution of American popular music, unless there are revolutions in people's buying habits. And these would probably have to occur at the rate of 45 revolutions per minute.

The following is the Collegian music staff's choice of the best records of 1979. If they seem too obscure, you are probably a victim of the 70's Superstar Syndrome.

PERRY ADLER

1) SEX PISTOLS: Great Rock'n'Roll Swindle—a deserved spit on propriety, and a riot, to boot.
2) CLASH: the most energetic and meaningful band of our time.
3) DAVID JOHANSEN: In Style—though not his best, he can still make you believe like no one else.
45: "Rock'n'Roll School": RAMONES—a rehash, but all we had this year from the ultimate purveyors of fun.

TOM ANDERSON

1) TALKING HEADS: Fear of Music—the brightest hope for rock in the 80's.
2) IAN HUNTER: You're Never Alone with a Schizophrenic—the most impressive comeback album of the year; at least one old-timer still has it.
3) ELVIS COSTELLO: Armed Forces—not his best, but Elvis is still King.
45: "Girls Talk": DAVE EDMUNDS—sheer brilliance.

BRETT MILANO

1) SQUEEZE: Cool for Cats—clever, innovative, and often brilliant; catch them now and beat the crowds.
2) BUZZCOCKS: Singles Going Steady—Never before has unrequited love been this much fun.
3) POLICE: Regatta De Blanc—Pulsating rhythms and memorable melodies make every track irresistable.
4) NICK LOWE: Labour Of Lust—Though not as original as last year's Pure Pop, this one beats it for melodic sense and pure audacity.
45: "The Shape of Things to Come: HEADBOYS—both musically and lyrically, this is a starling anticipation of the 80's.

Editorial/Opinion

The bad, the good

Jackson Katz

Before we criticize all the social and political leaders of our time for screwing things up so badly and not really caring about anything except their power and pocketbooks, we should take another look. Very often the people who we think are total jerks are in fact doing immeasurable good for society.

The ways in which they do this, however, are sometimes unclear to us, and require a lot of patience and understanding.

You see, most of the people in positions of power and authority in this world are good people. They truly care about the quality of life of all people. But they realize that they can't make things better on their own, that mass movements are required to make things better, to effect social change. So in order to stir up the public, they have to create a situation where great numbers of people realize how bad things actually are.

History has shown us over and over again that people don't react to change things until things get real bad. Recognizing this, these leaders make things real bad, real quick, in order to speed up these social-changing, mass movements.

Take Ed King, for example. We all think he's a total jerk, acting not in the best interests of anyone except big business and his buddies. But that's not the case! He's making things so bad for poor people, and women who want equality (and abortions), and people under age 21, and environmentalists, and...that people are finally starting to see how bad things are and demanding change!

Or how about on this very campus! The IMSA realized that anti-Semitism still existed, so they published a pamphlet so totally racist and irrational that people began to deal with just how stupid it is to be prejudiced against people for their religion. They (IMSA) performed a valuable service to Jews and all people.

The Ku Klux Klan, they even go to the length of killing people for their color to make people see how inhuman racial prejudice is!

How about Anita Bryant? In order to further the struggle for freedom of sexual preference, she took the role of anti-gay. By publicly crusading against gays, she made many people realize how ridiculous it is to persecute people for their sexual preference. Another service rendered in the name of social change!

The reason why our lawmakers and leaders won't legalize marijuana is so that people will experience every day the disparity between their needs and desires and the government's responses to these. If they did legalize it, people would be content that the government does serve their best interests and not continue to demand their rights.

And SALT II! Grown men spending months debating details about how many times the world can be blown up? No – they're just doing this so everyone will see how crazy nuclear weapons and the "arms race" is!

Then there's the distribution of wealth. The oil companies realized that the gap between the few rich and the many poor was really growing, so they decided they had to go our and make "obscene" profits in the billions of dollars while numerous people worried about freezing to death in their homes, before people started getting really mad.

The Ayatollah Khomeini, contrary to what most of us believe, is simply showing us the danger of any system where church and state aren't separated.

And President Carter, he let this Iranian crisis happen for a couple of reasons. First, so that when the draft bill comes up again, it will be passed. He realizes that especially young people won't protest U.S. intervention in other countries' affairs for "economic interest" purposes until they're asked to die for them! And secondly, he let this thing happen so it would become crystal clear to everyone that it is the government, and not the people of this country, that causes all of the international problems that we find our country increasingly involved in.

I could go on forever. There are so many people doing things for the overall benefit of humanity that people mistakenly criticize! I wish people would only recognize the contributions these people are making! Remember, these people wouldn't be doing the things they are if they didn't think it was the best way they could help society.

After all, people couldn't really be as inhumane as they sometimes appear, could they?

You can fix it

This week the Collegian published a five-part series on UMass buildings, the problems that caused them and the problems they are causing.

This series is the result of six weeks of research into a subject so steeped in memorandums, reports, contracts, studies, and bureaucrats it was not until after a team of reporters had been working for two or three weeks that they realized this series was the beginning and not the end.

The impetus behind the research stems from the barrage of problems that plague most of our buildings and therefore us. The roofs in our dorms, classrooms, the Campus Center, and administration building began leaking after only a short time in operation.

The Campus Center garage needed work done in 1978 that was prioritized by its "risk to life of the garage occupants." And then of course there is our library, that agglomeration of knowledge which now stands impotent. Its brick facade a sword of Damocles looming over campus.

The Collegian is not alone in its investigation. The Rents and Fees Committee of the Student Center for Educational Research and Advocacy and the Legal Services Office, too, have been working long and hard to unravel the riddle. It is through these types of group efforts the formidable undertaking of researching and investigating the University's expansion over the past 15 to 20 years can be accomplished.

Research and investigation serve to inform the community but are useless if left to stand alone. The purpose of our research is to uncover the systematic and bureaucratic problems that spawned this crumbling campus, and to use our resources to initiate the action and support necessary for reform.

Rich LaVoice, Student Government Association co-president, was able to introduce a bill into the House that would have increased the UMass Building Authority membership to include a graduate and undergraduate student. The bill died on the House floor but is expected to be resubmitted. This type of student input is vital if we are to insure responsiveness from the varied bureaucracies that govern the University. (Including our own.)

The state legislature mandated the Special Commission Concerning State and County Buildings. It has been investigating the construction process of the Bureau of Building Construction (BBC), which is charged with the construction of all state buildings (like our library) for the past several months and has just recently sent its legislative proposals to the House.

Nineteen-eighty is an election year and without our support those reforms may never get out of committee.

Through this series we hope to spur action toward solving the problems effecting this campus, but more importantly, we hope it will make the community aware that there is something being done and that we do need your support.

'Norma B.': Congratulations

To the Editor

Due to the controversiality that has seemed to arise over the "Norma B" comic strip, I believe congratulations are in order for both the Collegian and the writer.

The strip took on a very touchy subject. I don't have any opinion on whether it belongs in a comic strip or even if the way in which it dealt with the subject is correct. I just think it was pretty "ballsy" of all those involved.

I do believe an interesting observation can be made of all complaints that were made. All the complaints the women made, (I hope I'm not being presumtuous in saying "women") may very well have been valid, but none of them felt so strongly that they would stop reading the Collegian. Again, assuming none of them sounded on the verge of boycotting "Norma B," I believe the writer has just, unmeaningly, created a new form of "editorial." Each day seems to bring in new reaction.

No, personally, the strip doesn't offend me - but then again, I've never been pregnant.

Again, I think the Collegian and the writer should be commended just for dealing with the issue.

Reader: Young 'worst ever'

To the Editor

I was disgusted after reading in the Collegian about the Board of Trustees dispute about whether to award an honorary degree to Andrew Young. What is there is dispute about? Andrew Young was the worst U.N. ambassador the U.S. has ever had.

When President Carter was muscling the Russians to fighten up on their dissidents, Young had to blab to the world about our own political prisoners and name dropping the tyrants supported by the U.S. He is also responsible for dragging U.S. foreign policy into Africa. For years we had been content to politely ignore Africa, but noooo Young has to go and start making friends among all those African leaders. (As if we didn't have enough "friends" as it is.)

And then there were the Palestinians. Just because they happen to be the key to peace in the Middle East, Young thinks they should be included, even though the President is perfectly willing to ignore them too.

Andrew Young obviously did not understand the most basic principle of diplomacy: Never try to implement in your own country the standards you impress on your rivals.

If we must award an honorary degree lets give it to someone who really knows about international diplomacy, like David Rockefellor or ITT.

'Malice' column: Reader 'appalled'

To the Editor:

In regards to a columnist's article, "On Banishing Malice," which like most articles in the Collegian, purports no unifying stream of thought, I was very much appalled.

Not only does he attack the committee formed to combat anti-Semitism (a hatred I assume he is for, because he doesn't say otherwise), Nummo News (which represents an "ideological faction") and the Collegian but he goes on to tell us that our school paper's policy of irresponsibility (in regards to printing anything on its editorial page) is justified because it is not a direct form of violence.

Bull! With that kind of reasoning, wouldn't I have the right to call the next woman that passed me by anything that comes into my smutty mind?

Don't we have enough trouble on campus without such (expletive deleted) columnists?

Hey listen, no violence intended, right?

NOWCAT counsellors join feminist forces

By DEBBIE ROBERTI
Collegian Staff

The Network of Women Councilors and Therapists (NOWCAT) is "going strong", with approximately 102 female members, from Amherst, Northampton and other nearby towns after only two years in existence, and its founder, Carol Drexler.

NOWCAT is a professional organization run by volunteers, and is open to women counsellors and graduate students in the mental health field. What makes NOWCAT unique, Drexler said, is that it consists entirely of feminists.

NOWCAT provides its members with feminist support. Monthly meetings are held with programs to build skills, discuss issues of political concern and to supply a foundation for feminist ideas and values. Drexler said the members work with each other and for each other.

pathological states, and it is more a connection of overlapping than any casual relationship one with the other." Turcott said.

UMass Newman Center's Reverent Joseph Quigly said, "Pornographic material is nothing but erotic material--sexually stimulating material. A blindspot in our education is psychology. There are a lot of misconceptions. You have to discriminate between what is sex and what is violence."

UMass student Denise Kendell, who participated in the march, said, "The legal definition of obscenity has to be changed to focus on violence, not sex." Kendell who works in Women's Issues for the Student Center for Education Research and Advocacy (SCERA), said pornography is "anti-female propoganda. It exploits and encourages violence against women."

Linda Geary, who also works for SCERA said, "I would like to see conditions changed for women in the job market. "The pornographic industry is male-controlled and it offers high salaries to women to participate in it."

Geary said male pornography is "less obvious. Men are not just exploited for their bodies. There is a lot of suggestion that the man is on his way to a successful occupation. It's a status trip."

A popular student pastime on this campus is pinball. Pictures of half-dressed women are denicted on many of the machines, some located in the Student Union Building and the Newman Center. These images, said Steinem at the march infer, "Women are toys. Women are mechanical devices."

Quigley said he did not notice anything pornographic about pinball machine in the snackbar of the Newman Center which flashes on and off in the groin area of a man's body. "I never even alluded to the flashing light as being pornographic," he said. "I think you can read a lot into things."

UMass student Wendy Lawrence saw Deep Throat when it was on campus. She said, "In the beginning I found the movie erotic. There were naked bodies and I became aroused. But it became repetitious as the photography only focused on the parts of the body that were supposed to be erotic, that is penises and vaginas. Kind of get 'em in, get 'em out."

"Because there was no love, the sexual acts became violent." she said. "It wasn't whips and chains, it doesn't have to be that. It was constant wear and tear on that part of a woman's body. I became self-conscious. It was a freak show. I wondered what men were thinking of women."

"I felt violated as a woman." Lawrence said. "The movie was not aesthetically pleasing to the eye. I was very disturbed. I felt physically drained, physically tired."

Pornography is estimated to be a $4 billion industry. It remains to be seen whether society will choose to stifle it. The march was the first of its kind. It was the largest feminist protest in history. Steinem said that day, "If there is not equality between men and women, everytime we come together it will be pornographic."

Tomorrow reporter Rod Carveth examines some laws and studies concerning pornography. His article also contains an interview with the owner of the Majestic Theater in Easthampton, which screens pornographic films.

Workshops are often held at monthly meetings on such topics as dreams, sexuality, anger and incest, she said. These presentations are given by members or other area women. Along with being an excellent educational experience for NOWCAT members Drexler said, these workshops are a beneficial, skill-building opportunity for women in the community.

NOWCAT plans to hold its first conference in the Spring of 1980. It will be a weekend event, but plans have not yet been finalized according to Drexler.

As a tool to share information, NOWCAT prints a monthly newsletter which includes information on new counseling techniques, job outlooks in the mental health field and scheduled meetings. Anyone can subscribe to the newsletter. For more information Drexler may be contacted at 256-6159.

The most important aspect of NOWCAT is that the organization exists for its members, Drexler said. The idea originated when one woman stood up and declared herself a feminist, she said, but it was established when that woman discovered she was not alone.

Women's Ski Expo at Stratton Mtn.

Woman's World, a joint venture of Women's Pro Skiing and Woman's Way Ski Seminars, is organizing the first Woman's World Ski Exposition, to be held Jan. 6 to 13 at Stratton Mountain, Vermont.

According to Woman's Way founder Elissa Slanger, the exposition is designed to attract women who want more than a standard ski vacation. The week includes a Women-in-Sport trade show, equipment demonstrations, and clinics on nutrition, fitness, skin care, and clothing. There will also be special "on-hill" skiing events.

Women interested in attending should contact the Stratton Ski Resort, toll-free at (800) 451-4261, and request information on reservations for the Women's Ski Expo Week.

UMass employee receives award

An Iroquois woman employed by the UMass Committee for the Collegiate Education of Black Students, was honored at the National Indian Education Association held last week in Denver. Colorado.

Laini Brodeur Morrison, who lives in Gilbertville, Mass., received an award for outstanding service to the Indian community before a gathering of over 7,000 American Indians.

Morrison earned a bachelor's degree in Business Administration from the Univerisity of California at Los Angeles, and a master's degree in Public Administration from the University of New Mexico.

Accepting the award, Morrison said, "I am greatly honored to receive this award. No amount of money or acquisition of title has ever, nor will ever mean as much to me as the approval of my people."

Nine UM students to work at Olympics

Nine University of Massachusetts students will be working in the press services division at the 13th Olympic Winter Games in Lake Placid, N.Y., during February.

The students were chosen from more than 50 applicants in a program administered by the Journalistic Studies Program.

The Olympic Committee will employ them as paid supervisors in the main press headquarters, the various competition arena press centers and the broadcast center. Their responsibilities will include organizing and managing personnel in the centers and assisting some 3,000 foreign journalists who will be covering the Winter Games.

The students and their departments: Nancy Anderson, Journalistic Studies; Mary Generelli, Italian; Brad Johnson, Slavic Languages and Literature; Maureen Kenney, Journalistic Studies; Pam Lindmark, Journalistic Studies; Carolyn Mooney, Journalistic Studies; Therese Pasquale-Maguire, Comparative Literature; Sarah Pattee, BDIC; and Diane Pfeines, Journalistic Studies.

Campus recyclers receive awards

The Miller Reclamation Program, a campus-wide recycling project, has announced its winners--those organizations which have collected the most bottles and cans for the semester, according to a spokeswoman.

Lori Schlager yesterday named Alpha Tam Gamma, a fraternal organization, and Alpa Chi Omega, a sorority, as the first-place winners for recycling the most material this semester.

Second-place winners, Schlager said, were Sigma Alpha Nu and Crabtree Dormitory. And in third-place were Zeta Psi and Thoreau Dormitory.

preference helps to develop "the healthy notion of the individual."

Cole said that the "root of discrimination, whether sexist, racist or in any other form" has to be understood "at the source" to be alleviated.

Another stated problem to face is that of economic problems of the country. The Women's Studies program at UMass began in 1974 according to Margo Culley as "largely a labor of love...built out of astonishingly moderate resources." The program, according to Culley, has been named one of the top seven in the country by a national review, and yet it doesn't have one full-time professor. Mary Ruth Warner comes the closest, but she is here only on two-thirds time. All the others are professors "loaned out" from other departments, Culley said.

Cathy Portuges, coordinator of the program, said the University's financial problems have made it increasingly difficult for departments to loan out their faculty to Women's Studies.

Sandy Kaplan, in the psychology department, said she also was concerned with the economic situation's effect on women's issues, such as abortion for welfare women, day care centers and the work situation in general.

The three staff members of the Women's Studies program, Portuges, Arlene Avakia, and Dale Melcher, all agreed the 70's were a real let down for women in general.

Portuges said, "The good thing about the coming of the 80's is that it means the end of the 70's." However, there were a few gains, according to Avakia, including the "legitimization of Women's Studies on this campus."

Professor of Art History Anne Mochon said women have been making great strides in art through "protest, and the creation of women's cooperative galleries and associations."

She said she would like to see "more of an integration of women's concerns into museum and gallery exhibitions." In the 80's she said, "Women artists can apply the strengths they have developed in the 70's."

Everyone interviewed said they felt it was impossible to have one leader in the Women's Movement. Culley said it would be "scary" to have one. Melcher said, "No one woman can address all the issues, represent all women." And Portuges said, "The movement is inherently opposed to the notion of a leader."

"We come from different histories--my history is different than that of white women. But the underlying issues are the same" said Love. We don't know about the outcome. We do know that we are at different starting places.

"But I'm not willing to ignore, to not engage in the issues just because we are at different starting places," she said.

★ Commission

these (construction) problems would not have manifested themselves." Lesser denied reports from the Ward Commission that the BBC does not supervise construction.

Lesser said that during construction work, supervision of contractors by the BBC is "complicated. We don't see every detail as it's built. We'd have to have 50 people—one for each worker."

"We are prepared to pursue construction firms, designers or engineers afterward if they are at fault," he said.

State Attorney General Francis X. Belotti has backed up the BBC and UMass in two law suits. Last year Belotti filed a $7 million civil suit against the engineering firm of Jackson and Moreland of Philadelphia, which designed the ill-fated $11 million Tillson Steam Plant. Last week his office announced another suit may be forthcoming against those responsible for the crumbling University Library.

The process

When a state-funded building is proposed at UMass, the University Board of Trustees submits a request to the State Director of Administration and Finance. After approval, the director passes the proposal along to the BBC, which estimates the building's cost. The proposal is sent to the Governor for approval and then goes before the legislature for funding appropriations.

According to the Ward Commission, this final step in the approval process creates a major problem since money for a building is appropriated before an accurate construction cost estimate is made. A case in point may be the University Library, which was originally appropriated $12 million, but actually cost $16 million.

Cost overruns in the process are not restricted to UMass. John Larkihg Thompson, former chairman of the Massachusetts Authority, testifying before the commission, said the Middlesex County Courthouse, estimated by proposers to cost $17 million, finally cost the taxpayers $50 million after a 17 year delay in construction

The Ward Commission also criticized the BBC's Designer Selection Board, which advertises for architects, then selects bids from those interested in designing the building.

According to their report, the board does not have any paid staff to help members screen applications. They are appointed by the governor. Direct construction experience is not required of any member, and the board is saddled with an excessive workload. There is no standard procedure by which architects are selected, the report charged.

Another problem pointed out by the Ward Commission is contractor selection. "In too many cases, the lowest bidder is not well qualified to undertake the work, and shoddy workmanship results," their report stated. "Even a contractor with a long history of problems on prior jobs will be accepted if he is the low bidder."

The report states that management of funds is greatly diminished by a lack of centralized responsibility. The absence of almost any centralized authority, below Lesser in the BBC, burdens the director and impedes efficient management.

The report concluded there is no existing state agency which has the authority to prevent and detect fraud and waste in appropriated funds.

WMUA speaks on sports

With the 1980's approaching us rapidly and the 1970's quickly becoming as obsolete as the Susan B. Anthony dollar, it seems that all sports journalists (along with everyone else) are giving their own versions of the 70's sports in review. Albeit interesting to read and/or listen to everybody's view on what was or was not a big event in the sporting world, it can tend to get repetitious. Since twenty-twenty hindsight is the ultimate weapon of all sports neurotics (myself included), in order to avoid repetition (and boredom), I will attempt to give you twenty-twenty foresight into the 80's.

In baseball, free agency will continue to flourish, and will gain momentum throughout the 80's. For the Red Sox, the 1980 season will pick up where the 70's left off, which means more high priced, inept free agent signings. Skip Lockwood will get the Mike Torrez syndrome of giving up a lot of runs in his first inning. Unfortunately for Skip, a relief pitcher cannot be effective that way, and will add to the multitude of mediocrity on the Sox staff.

George Steinbrenner and the Yankees also will continue where they left off, buying up free agents at will. By 1983, the Yanks will have sent to the minors Ron Guidry, Willie Randolph, and Ruppert Jones because every other Yankee will have life-long-no cut contracts thanks to free agency. The Rupert Jones story will be an extra sad one, as after being saved by greedy George, Steinbrenner will, prior to the 1980 season , obtain Omar Moreno, Fred Lynn and Garry Maddox. Gene Michael and Dick Howser will rationalize these trades by saying, "You never have enough centerfielders."

Steinbrenner's coup de grace will occur in 1988, when he will have obtained every major league ballplayer for New York. At that time he will start the SL, the Steinbrenner League, to replace the American and National Leagues. With Reggie Jackson as commissioner and Catfish Hunter as President, the SL will have teams only in markets where a guaranteed annual attendance of five million people for one hundred games will be. 90 percent of all the profits will go to Steinbrenner, and, of course, New York will win the pennant every year.

In the National Basketball Association, a new statistical catagory, the glass shattering dunk, will be instituted for the 1980-81 season. Darryl Dawkins will lead the league with 44, one for every backboard in every city. Dawkins demolition dunks will come to an end, when, during the 1981 playoffs, in a heated game with the Portland Trailblazers,he will mistakenly dunk Portland coach Jack Ramsey through the hoop. Dawkins will be suspended five years and requested to reconstruct Ramsey's face for the Basketball Hall of Fame.

Dispute over Schaefer continues

FOXBORO, Mass (AP) — Foxboro selectmen have decided to step into a squabble between the New England Harness Raceway and the New England Patriots that some fear could keep the pro football team out of Schaefer Stadium next year.

The town authorized its lawyer Tuesday night to work on the long-standing dispute between the horse track and the stadium next door where the National Football League team plays.

The track reportedly is threatening to lock out the Pats and the New England Tea Men soccer team unless each pays the track $2 million.

The dispute centers on the fact that part of the stadium land is owned by the track, and the track insists on not having any events at the facility while its racing is underway. For the 1980 season, that will be between April 15 and Oct. 21.

Max O'Meara, part owner and director of the track, denied that the teams were being threatened or asked for $2 million apiece. But Tea Men executive Derek Carroll told the Boston Herald American that Foxboro Associates, which runs the track, had asked the Tea Men for the $2 million.

"It didn't come as any surprise," Carroll said. "The last time around they asked the Patriots and us for a total of $5 million... We're not the least bit interested in helping bail out the raceway from its financial problems."

The Tea Men reportedly are on the verge of moving the North American Soccer League franchise to Rhode Island.

Vin Igo, a town school committee member who was instrumental in bringing the stadium to Foxboro in 1971, told the selectmen Tuesday night he understood a meeting took place at which the track threatened to bar the teams from using the stadium in 1980.

He said Foxboro gets more than $200,000 from taxes on Patriots tickets and the team employs numerous townspeople.

The Tea Men, who were unable to settle scheduling differences with the track last season, played their games at Boston University. Igo said that move cost the town about $100,000 in revenue.

The race track already has a court opinion in is favor. The court has said the track has the authority from the original 1971 lease to control any events scheduled for the stadium at the same time racing was scheduled.

IM teams wrap up seasons

By DONNA SULLIVAN
Collegian Staff

Intramural Three-on-Three basketball action finished up last night with Sugar 'n Spice and Force Two coming out on top. Force Two was undefeated and stayed that way beating the PW's 12-10.

Wilbur Jackson, Max Jones, and Gary Pearson were the force of Force Two and Ray Murphy, Rick Gordon, and Bob Jacobs played for the PW's.

Liz Skelton, Kelly Butler, Wilma Tynes and Nancy O'Neal of Sugar and Spice trounced the Whimps with an 11-5 score. Coming in second, the Whimps sent out Nancy Arena, Nancy Santaguida, and Julie Mendelsohn.

The Flakes will face the Indians in the women's volleyball final tonight, both teams winning in last night's semi-final action.

Michelle Schwartzman put the game away for the Flakes with an unreturnable spike that landed on the line. The Flakes beat the Forbes who had defeated them in regular season play. The Flakes won this time though, 15-10, 5-15, 15-12.

The Indians earned their spot in the finals with a quick win over the M&M's 15-5, 15-6.

The Space Setters will face the Prodigals in the co-recreational volleyball final tonight, both teams winning their semi-finals in two games.

The Space Setters took an early lead over the N.Y. Balls 10-6 in the first game. The Balls threatened bringing the score to 12-12 but the Space Setters held on for the 15-12 win.

Led by Tami Gannon and her devastating serve and some strong and fancy spiking the Space Setters took the second game easily 15-1. Gannon started the action and did not finish until she had chalked up ten points for the Setters.

The Prodigals got a scare in both of their games—both went to overtime. The Prodigals hung tough, defeating the Sodhusters 17-15, 16-14.

In men's action, Iowa Tech defeated Beta Kappa Phi and Nylon—4-2, defeated the Preppies 15-10, 15-1 to advance to the finals.

Iowa Tech played incredibly strong in the first game, winning 15-6, lost momentum in the second losing 10-15, then poured it on in the third and deciding game for a 15-10 win.

In the IM raquetball championship, two previosuly undefeated league champions, Curt P. Kohlberg and Phillip Fisher battled it out. Fisher, a freshman, came out on top with a 21-5 score. In the women's division Tricia Keene defeated Pat O'Brien 21-16, 21-18.

Held late last night was the Intramural hockey final with What the Puck facing off Hot F-Tunas. What the Puck was undefeated after playing nine teams during the regular season and seeded first in the playoff tournament.

They are led by two ex-varsity UMass hockey players, Dean Liacos and Chris Lowey.

Sixth seeded Hot F-Tuna defeated the third and second seeds to advance to the finals. The team from Baker had seven wins, one loss and two ties during the regular season, their only loss to What the Puck.

The final was played at 10 o'clock last night at the Greenfield Ice Arena.

Mermen host Chiefs, look for 1st win

By SCOTT SOLOMON
Collegian Staff

The 0-2 UMass men's swimming team will be looking for its first victory of the season this afternoon when they face winless Springfield Chiefs (0-3) at 4 p.m. at Boyden Pool.

The Minutemen have suffered losses to B.U. (80-33), and Tufts (72-41) in both of their previous meets.

Although UMass Coach Russ Yarworth has not finalized the list of starting swimmers for his club, he feels positive about this third meet. "We have just about the same strength," said Yarworth, "so it will be a very close meet."

The Minutemen will have the services of John Sleeman, who has returned after a brief bout with the flu. Steve Samuel is hurting from a similar illness, but he is slated for this afternoon's contest. Diver Dan Anthony is healthy, and Coach Yarworth feels that his premier board man will be able to capture both the one and three-meter events.

Springfield is relying on the strength of a pair of senior co-captains, fly man Paul Leger and Rick Parker, who will be featured in the 200 and 500 yard races. In the 1000-yd. event it will probably be Minuteman Dan Boucher vs. junior Doug Hagen.

In the diving competition Mike Prutz will perform in each board event

The Chiefs have been beaten by the heart of the Ivy's this season dropping meets to Bowdoin, Dartmouth, and Brown.

A final message

As I sit writing my final column of my UMass career, with the docile tones of the Christmas carol Little Drummer Boy pining away in the background, I remind myself that in terms of active service, I am the oldest columnist having begun writing weekly pieces back in the fall of 1977.

It has been a tradition at the Collegian ever since I can remember to incorporate the final column as a "Goodbye Column" with tearful farewells to friends, athletes, coaches, etc. But I intend to stay away from this because I feel that although I will no longer be on the campus per se, I am not leaving UMass to my memories.

For my final few paragraphs of print, I would like to leave you students, faculty, and personnel of the university with a message. One I hope you will take some time to think about.

When I first came to the UMass campus back in orientation in June of 1976, I was amazed at what I saw. The buildings, landscape, and vastness of the campus were more than enough to take my breath away. The docileness of the campus during the summer made me believe that this place was some kind of utopia plopped down in the middle of the Massachusetts terrain. Yet when the semester started, my outlook towards the school began to change.

Dorm life, which is supposed to be pleasant experience and a youngster's first attempt at living on his own, doesn't turn out to be a pleasure cruise at all. Not entirely because of the students, many of which I remain good friends with, but because of the UMass system. A system which I believe attempts to turn an outgoing, responsible individual into a miniature robot.

The conditions of the dorms, leading them to resemble ghetto tenements, and the apathy of the University hierarchy to improve conditions, lead a student to wonder if college is all that it's supposed to be.

As for academia, from the first zot at orientation who told me to sign up in every class for section one, thereby insuring that I got at least one eight o'clock class to my misfortune in trying to find an internship for the upcoming spring semester, insuring my graduation, I have found that college is not an easy way of life.

There is an abundance of red tape to wade through (thank you, Whitmore!), which inadvertently deters from one's academic pursuits.

It has forced me on several occasions to reconsider whether chasing after the academic dream is a worthwhile pursuit or not. As you can tell by the appearance of this column (and not necessarily the content) it was.

Slipping away from direct university involved issues, there are the indirect responsibilities at a university for the student such as parties, sports, and alcoholism. One of the things that has disappointed me over my stay at UMass has been the inability for a kid to enjoy himself or herself in an individual manner without ridicule. While it is normal for a person's peer group to attempt to pressure someone into conforming with the majority, the right of an individual to enjoy himself in his own manner is a right that should not be denied.

In summing up, while I for the most part have enjoyed my three and a half years here at UMass and am somewhat sorry to leave, I would like to say that there is a lot of work to be done at this school in many areas. Academics, buildings, bureaucracy, and student attitudes are all areas that must be worked on for this university to improve its present state. And for those of you who are remaining at the university for the upcoming semester, I hope that you will do your part to turn this school into something everyone can be proud of and respect.

Goodbye, UMass. And good luck.

OPEC nations hike oil prices by 33 percent

By WILLIAM GLASGALL
Associated Press

Saudi Arabia and three other OPEC members announced a 33 percent price increase for their crude oil yesterday, five days before the cartel's pricesetting meeting in Venezuela.

The increases could boost U.S. gasoline and heating oil prices by 7¼ cents to 11 cents a gallon if Nigeria, Algeria and Libya — which already charge around $26 — also raise their prices, industry sources said.

Saudi Arabia, OPEC's largest oil exporter, was joined in the $6-a-barrel increase by the United Arab Emirates, Qatar and Venezuela, a founding member of the 13-nation cartel and the host of Monday's OPEC meeting in Caracas.

With OPEC nations selling oil on spot markets for $40 a barrel and up, the increases were "an effort to organize prices" before the oil ministers' conference, Venezuelan Energy Minister Humberto Calderon Berti told a Caracas news conference.

Berti did not rule out further price increases at the conference.

Industry sources said yesterday's moves represented efforts by Saudi Arabia and other moderates to ward off even higher increases by some cartel members at the meeting of members of the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries.

The Saudi increase — from $18 to $24 for a 42-gallon barrel — was retroactive to Nov. 1, Mobil Corp. said. Exxon Corp. said Abu Dhabi, the largest member of the United Arab Emirates, also boosted prices effective Nov. 1, while the Venezuelan boost was set for most customers at midnight Thursday.

Because Venezuela will drop its oil surcharge after the boost, its actual price will rise from $20 to $24.

An energy economist said yesterday that the increase will cost the average New England household $26 a year. The news gets worse from there.

New Englanders could find their energy costs pushed up $267 a year if other Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries follow the trend, said Wayne Oliver, an energy economist with the New England Regional Commission.

Oliver said that translates to a two cent-a-gallon increase in crude prices, which would then push up costs of home heating oil, gasoline and electricity.

He said yesterday's announcement means a household using an average of 1,200 gallons of heating oil a year will have to pay $24 more annually. The same household will have to pay $26 more a year for an average of 1,300 gallons of gasoline and another $7 for electricity.

That's as good as the news gets.

The price hike comes on the eve of a meeting by OPEC nations in Caracas, Venezuela. Oliver said if the other oil exporters follow the Saudi Arabian lead, it will push fuel costs by nearly $270 a year.

Library opens for all for 10 day test period

By CHRISTOPHER H. SCHMITT
Collegian Staff

The main tower of the University Library will reopen today for all undergraduates, in a move that could clear the way for unlimited access for undergraduates next semester.

Library Director Richard Talbot announced yesterday that for a 10-day trial period, beginning today and ending Dec. 24, the tower will be open to all undergraduates with a current ID, provided the number of students in the building does not exceed 500. He said depending on the number of people who decide to use the building, access restrictions now in place may be dropped next semester.

"We hope to do that," he said. "If it turns out we're not being overwhelmed, we may be able to relax the restrictions."

The hours for the trial period will be Monday through Friday, 8 a.m.-10 p.m.; Saturday, 10 a.m.-6 p.m.; and Sunday, 10 a.m.-10 p.m. Access will be through the northeast entrance near the Student Union Building.

Currently, only graduate students and undergraduates with a "pressing need" are allowed into the structure. Undergraduates need a special pass. The library was opened for limited access Dec. 3, after it was closed at the beginning of the semester because of the possibility of falling bricks.

Since the limited reopening eight days ago, an average of 240 people per day have been using the library, Talbot said. He said the low turnout prompted library officials to seek ways to allow greater access to the structure.

Should unlimited access be restored, Talbot said staffing could become a problem. Since most library materials for undergraduates will remain in the old Goodell Library, there probably will be inadequate funds to maintain two libraries.

Currently, he said, four people are on duty in the tower at night, compared to a normal complement of ten. Ten students also are at work, reshelving books and providing other support services.

"Staff could be a problem," he said.

Reference materials, and volume listing will remain at Goodell during the trial period.

Talbot said if the tower should be opened to undergraduates next semester, the "total numbers" of people in the building may not change, but the students may not be required to have a pass to be allowed in.

The decision to open the tower yesterday was made in the closing moments of the day, according to a staffer, who said "we just feel like we've been closed.

"It appears we should make an effort to extend to the undergraduates whatever we can, particularly during the exam period," the staffer said.

Final examinations begin Tuesday and continue through Saturday.

Blizzards won't stop the finality of exams

By JACK GALLAGHER

Except for the windowless Graduate Research Center, class-time was gazing-time yesterday, as Mother Nature dumped her first load of snow on western Massachusetts this season.

The adage, "New England weather: If you don't like it, wait five minutes" was proved once again, as Wednesday's near-70 degree temperatures gave way to yesterday's Northeaster.

The National Weather Service in Windsor Locks, Conn. predicted a two-to-four inch accumulation in the Amherst area, with light snow in the afternoon gradually tapering off overnight.

NWS said the low pressure system, which formed off a cold front which came through our area Wednesday night, would continue moving east-northeastward before passing south off the coast of Cape Cod.

And, needless to say, travelers advisories were in effect for inland sections of Massachusetts, Connecticut and southern Vermont and New Hampshire.

Asked whether snow accumulations could be more than the two-to-four-inch prediction, NWS said "not necessarily."

However, as of 10 p.m., 2 inches of the white stuff had fallen in Amherst.

Snow schedule for finals

In the event of final exam cancellations because of snow, the following rescheduling procedures, as released by the Scheduling Office at Whitmore, are to be adhered to:

If campus is closed until 11 a.m., the 8 a.m. period is rescheduled to 6:30 p.m. and the 10:30 a.m. period is rescheduled to 8:45 p.m.—the same day.

If campus is closed for exams all day, but open at night, the morning exams follow the same rescheduling procedure and the 1:30 p.m. exam is rescheduled to 6:30 p.m. the next day; and the 4 p.m. is rescheduled to 8:45 p.m. the next day.

If campus is closed in the afternoon and night, morning exams will be held as usual and the 1:30 p.m. exam is rescheduled to 6:40 p.m. the next day; and the 4 p.m. exam is rescheduled to 8:45 p.m. the next day.

If campus is closed all day and night, exam periods will be rescheduled as follows: the 8 a.m. is rescheduled to 6:30 p.m. the next day and the 10:30 a.m. is rescheduled to 8:45 p.m. the next day. The 1:30 p.m. exam will be at 6:30 p.m., two days later and the 4 p.m. exam will be at 8:45 p.m., two days later.

The University does not plan to close campus for exams Dec. 21 or 22, and thus exams those days will not be rescheduled.

In the event of snow, exams will be in the same rooms previously scheduled.

Visitors to see hostages

By ALEXANDER G. HIGGINS
Associated Press

TEHRAN, Iran — Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini and Iranian militants gave the goahead yesterday for independent observers to visit the 50 Americans held captive at the U.S. Embassy. They said their decision was intended to counteract "aggressive propaganda" about treatment of the hostages.

Neither the Iranian leader nor his Moslem militant followers said when the outsiders might be allowed into the embassy, who they would be or whether they would see the Americans.

But ambassadors from 12 countries met yesterday with Foreign Minister Sadegh Ghotbzadeh to discuss visiting the hostages, and most observers thought the diplomats would be allowed to visit the embassy in the next two or three days.

The diplomats attending the meeting were from Australia, Austria, Canada, Finland, Greece, New Zealand, Norway, Portugal, Sweden, Switzerland, Denmark and Spain. The delegation was headed by the ambassador from Spain.

In Washington, White House press secretary Jody Powell questioned the Iranians' sincerity.

He said the observers must be internationally recognized and impartial, must be allowed to visit all of the hostages and must see them frequently. Otherwise it would be just a "cynical" attempt to divert attention from the hostages' plight, Powell said.

The hostages' 40th day of imprisonment was yet another with little sign of progress toward winning their release.

Chances for U.N. mediation appeared to improve, however, with the announcement that a full ambassador, Mansour Farhan, was being assigned to the Iranian mission at the United Nations. A lower-level diplomat had been representing Iran.

U.N. spokesman Rudolf Stajduhar said in New York that the ambassador's arrival "will facilitate talks" between Secretary-General Kurt Waldheim and Iranian authorities.

In his instructions to Ghotbzadeh, reported by the government's Tehran Radio, the ayatollah told his foreign minister to form an international commission as soon as possible "to investigate the aggressive policy of the United States in Iran especially during the treacherous deposed shah's regime."

Bomb scare evacuates E Lab

For the second this week, a bomb scare in a University building forced students and faculty to the streets. Yesterday's incident occurred at the Engineering Laboratory building at 8:30 a.m.

The threatening call came from a female who told an E Lab employee that a bomb would go off in one half hour and that it was "no joke." The unnamed employee called the police, who immediately cleared the building. No bomb was found during the investigation and students were allowed to return to the classrooms at 9:30 a.m. As in the first scare on Monday, there was an exam scheduled in the facility, at the time of the call.

Carter ready to end treaty with Taiwan

WASHINGTON [AP] — The Supreme Court yesterday cleared the way for the termination of the mutual defense treaty between the United States and Taiwan by refusing to hear a case challenging President Carter's authority to unilaterally end the pact.

The mutual defense treaty is scheduled to expire on Jan. 1. Carter announced a year ago that the treaty would be terminated as part of the process of normalizing relations with mainland China.

The Supreme Court voted 7-2 against hearing arguments from Sen. Barry Goldwater, R-Ariz., and 24 other current and former members of Congress who contended the Constitution requires the president to get congressional approval before ending a treaty.

In refusing to hear the case, the court did not address the constitutionality of Carter's action. The seven justices who voted against the Goldwater group did so for differing reasons.

The court's official statement came in a one-paragraph order. It sent the case back to a federal trial judge "with directions to dismiss the complaint" by Goldwater's lawyers.

Justice Lewis F. Powell Jr. wrote a brief concurring opinion in which he said the case was "not ripe for judicial review."

Justice William H. Rehnquist, joined by Chief Justice Warren E. Burger and Justices Potter Stewart and John Paul Stevens, said the issue was a "political question" that should not be considered by the high court.

Justice William J. Brennan Jr. voted to affirm a federal appeals court ruling that said Carter was authorized to end the treaty on his own. Justice Thurgood Marshall concurred in the court's action but did not explain his reasons.

Only Justices Byron R. White and Harry A. Blackmun said the Goldwater group should have a chance to argue its case.

Thirteen candidates set for Ma. primary

BOSTON [AP] — Three Democrats and 10 Republicans are on a preliminary list of candidates who will appear on the March 4 presidential primary ballot in Massachusetts, state Secretary Michael J. Connolly announced yesterday.

The Democrats listed by Connolly are President Carter, Sen. Edward M. Kennedy of Massachusetts and Gov. Edmund G. Brown of California.

The Republicans are Rep. John B. Anderson of Illinois; Sen. Howard H. Baker of Tennessee; former UN Ambassador George H. Bush; former Gov. John B. Connolly of Texas, and Rep. Philip M. Crane of Illinois.

Also, Sen. Robert J. Dole of Kansas; California businessman Benjamin Fernandez; former NATO commander Alexander M. Haig, who was chief of staff in the Nixon White House; Sen. Larry Pressler of South Dakota and former Gov. Ronald W. Reagan of California.

Secret report: Afghanistan may have oil

WASHINGTON [AP] — Top secret U.S. intelligence reports allege that Soviet experts concluded eight years ago that Afghanistan probably has vast oil deposits but the finding was never reported to Afghani authorities, sources say.

The informants, who claim to have seen the data, said the Soviet assessment was based on an extensive geological survey the Soviets carried out in the neighboring country between 1969 and 1971.

The information came to light at a time when the Soviets have increased their military presence in Afghanistan.

The sources, who asked not to be quoted by name, said the Soviets wrote two contradictory reports after the geological survey was completed. One, prepared for the Afghanistan government, reportedly said the survey turned up no evidence of oil deposits.

The second report, sent to authorities in Moscow, said there were indications of potential vast oil reserves in Afghanistan, according to the informants.

Several U.S. oil experts who were contacted about the Soviet finding said they were unfamiliar with the intelligence report but that they doubted Afghanistan has significant petroleum reserves.

A State Department official said various geological surveys in Afghanistan undertaken by Western experts found that Afghanistan was oil-poor.

SETA: Civil, libel suits ensure Rampersad case to continue as focus of public debate

Editor's note: The following is the last installment of a five-part series examining the death of Seta T. Rampersad, a 20-year-old UMass student whose death last year spurred community concern when an inquest concluded no criminal negligence was involved.

This series was compiled by Betty Ciolek, Lee Goodwin, Darlene Lorkiewicz, Serena Richard and Robert E. Stein.

One week following Seta Rampersad's death the UMass Third World Women's Task Force, met with then District Attorney John Callahan to discuss the "suspicious" case. Callahan claimed first-hand knowledge of the case since he was with the state troopers when they were called to the Motel 6 hotel room where Rampersad died.

Although the first medical examiner termed the death suspicious, Callahan stated that Rampersad died of natural causes. He released a medical report which said Rampersad's lungs were full of fluid but the cause of death could not be determined. There was no evidence of poisons, chemicals or drugs, the report stated.

Because of the confusion surrounding the case, Callahan decided to call an inquest to "clear the air."

Following the inquest's conclusion on December 19, that none of the individuals involved violated the law, the new district attorney, Thomas Simons, closed the case. He said, "the death was not caused by negligence by any individuals."

Ozell Hudson, the Rampersad's lawyer, responded to the inquest ruling by saying Rampersad was "a victim of negligent misconduct" which could be translated into manslaughter.

The accusation by Hudson that justice was not done was echoed by members of the community and advocacy groups in their attempts to reopen the case.

Last May the Northampton courthouse was picketed by petition to re-open the case signed by 2,000.

A letter-writing campaign over the summer to State Attorney General Francis X. Bellotti, a rally in front of the Northampton Courthouse this fall, and a vigil at the Captain's Table demonstrated community concern over the issue. Bellotti did not respond.

The Committee Against Repression and the Third World Women's Task Force said they hope the civil suit they filed for negligence against Konstanlopulos, Newton and Pitzer will finally end the mystery surrounding Rampersad's death.

Another issue stemming from the case surfaced last April. A letter from the Third World Woman's Task Force reported that prior to Rampersad's death she was at a party with "prominent area persons." The task force sent the letter to Simons, Governor Edward King, Bellotti and State Representative James G. Collins, but refused to reveal their sources who said they were afraid of being identified.

Women of the 70's challenge old values

By JOYCE C. MUNROE
Collegian Staff

"The Decade of Women" is how feminist, singer and songwriter Holly Near described the seventies during her concert at the Fine Arts Center Tuesday night. Retracing the past ten years gives truth to her words.

The 70's were the years of "questions, exploration, and challenging old traditions and values," according to Jamila Gaston of Everywoman's Center here at UMass.

The growing women's movement gave birth to a variety of support groups, educational programs and women's centers like Everywoman's Center.

"Helping women who wanted to return to school was the basic goal achieved in the 70's," said Gaston, "and the continuing goal is to help women stay in school and to create an environment that will increase an access to information."

Everywoman's Center also provides a space for women who are beginning projects, like the Valley Women's Voice (newspaper) and the Women's Educational Equity Project.

Since the early 70's Everywoman's Center has worked to develop new services in response to women's needs including: The Poor Women's Task Force; The Third World Women's Task Force; women who deal with violence against women; The Working Women's Task Force; and Project Self.

Some of the women involved in the early work of Everywoman's Center recognized a need for University courses dealing with women. The Women's Studies Program was formed.

"The program was a response to a new consciousness directly related to the women's movement," said Arlene Avakian of the Women's Studies Program.

Starting out as a two-year pilot program, Women's Studies was reviewed and accepted 18 months ago, enabling a student to major in Women's Studies, according to Avakian.

A variety of other University programs have helped women. One of these is University Without Walls.

According to Gale Jensen of UWW, women who would otherwise not have a chance to pursue a full-time education are given that opportunity through UWW.

"We are designed for people who do not have access to the University, enabling women with family responsibilities and working women to be full-time students through independent study and special evening courses," said Jensen.

As women began to unite and challenge a patriarchal system, the 70's heralded a variety of legislative actions.

A woman's "right to choose" was recognized by the Supreme Court in 1973 and abortion was legalized.

Family Planning Centers sprang up and Massachusetts, the last state to legalize birth control for married women (in 1966), legalized birth control for unmarried women in 1972.

"Fighting back" became an important issue for women in the 70's as rapes increased 42 percent. Self-defense classes for women are becoming more and more available.

The controversial Title IX, described by Frank McInerny of the UMass Athletics Department as an "interpretation of a law" was devised to give girls and women equal educational and athletic opportunities.

Child Care Centers became more accessible for more women in the 70's, allowing them to work or return to school. The Head Start Program is one example.

And there is so much more. Is this success?

According to Jamila Gaston of Everywoman's Center, "theory is one thing and practice is another; passing legislation and having it enacted is yet another."

Maybe in the 80's...

End of semester tension leads many to depression

By PAUL BANKS
Collegian Staff

As winter snow is upon us, and the holidays draw near, fall semester 1979 draws to a close. Classes end on Monday, and final examinations begin. With finals, come stress and anxiety for many students.

According to David P. Kraft, M.D., Director of Mental Health at University Health Services students often feel a great deal of pressure and tension towards the end of each semester due to final exams.

"This is the time of the year when people feel most desparate," Kraft said. Perhaps a relationship in the life of a student is broken off, perhaps this same student dreads the upcoming holidays to be spent with the family," Kraft went on.

"The bulk of the people we see are 'normal' people in times of crisis. We try to help the person in solving problems...to help people cope with crises that develop," he said.

If a student feels concerned or desparate about final exams, Kraft would suggest putting things into perspective, and "giving yourself more time to do what you have to do."

He said that coping is partly a matter of managing your time. If friends invite you out this weekend, and you feel you ought to study, "it can be hard to say no. It's a matter of being assertive."

In Retrospect

The semester ends, the year changes and life goes on... But always a lesson learned. I returned to school this semester and after some contemplation, decided to accept the post as editor of the Black Affairs pages. Just another job, I thought. And what better way to work, serve the community and learn at the same time. In no way was I disappointed. Editing the pages was for me quite a learning experience.

In this, our last edition of the semester, I would like to share with you some of the vital lessons I learned or was reminded of, over the last three and a half months. First of all, I learned the importance of continuous struggel. Too often we sit back and take things for granted. We tend to forget that most of the facilities, programs and other services we make use of on a day to day basis, are the results of past struggles by members of the black community.

The New Africa House, the Afro-Am studies Department, the CCEBS Program, Nummo News, Drum and the various Third World Centers on this campus, for example, all carry a long history of struggle behind them. Students fought in each case jeopardizing their careers, their future (or perhaps building their future) and in some cases their lives.

We, the present students in the community owe it to them, to ourselves and future generations to preserve what we already have. The only way we can increase gains and improve our condition, is by building on what we already have. Remember, it is always better to ACT than REACT!

Over the last few years the Third World community has lost several organizations on this campus-Black Scientist Society, 1978; WEBD, 1978; ECO Latino, Black Psychology, 1974 and Third World Centers in Kennedy and John Adams. In addition, a number of organizations have faced drastic budget cuts. The responsibility lies with us to reverse these trends which now face us, not only in our community here, but also on a national level.

How often do we find ourselves picking up the newspaper and leveling criticisms at Nummo News or Black Affairs? Criticism is fine but it must not stop there. The next question to ask yourself is what have I done or what could I do to improve the situation? Or have you ever wondered what goes behind the production of every Black Affairs page? The torment, the aggravation, the struggle with Collegian over space.....

On this note I'd like to wrap things up. I'd like to say a special 'Thank You' to all staff members and other members of the community who contributed in any way to the Black Affairs pages. Have a good vacation and see you all next year!

A Butterfly with working wings

As we begin to recognize that the faces of clocks
Never change, they remain/essentially the same,
Only marking the passage of time by the Movement of their hands...
When we begin to realize that more things run on gasoline
Than Vaseline —
Which is to say that you can only slide so far,
Slick, you can be better than you are...
Once we begin to analyze that nobody in the world would Give a damn, if all that came out of a cocoon was a
Big Black Caterpillar —

You see, the wings are almost dry,
And as we prepare them to take to the sky,
To see the world thru a clearer eye,
Leaving behind the ugly-duckling lie,
It's beautiful enough to make you stop and cry,
to make you stop trying to "get" high:
That little crawly worm was Born to Fly!

The area persons alleged to be at the party include a about 200 persons while Simons was presented with a member of a local political family, an executive of a local paper, a local insurance agent, a management member of the Captain's Table, and an elected Hampshire County official. All deny the charges.

The Hampshire Country official is, Robert Czelusiak, County Register of Probate and former owner of the Captain's Table. He is sueing the Greenfield Recorder for libel for printing the Third World Woman's Task Force letter which named him.

Czelusiak also wants the Recorder to print a retraction which states that the paper "erroneously reported that" he "he was in attendance at a party held before the death of one Seta Rampersad and therefore is implicated in circumstances surrounding her death."

In a Valley Advocate article Czelusiak stated he volunteered to take a lie detector at the time of the letter's printing and swear he had no connection with the case. No official accepted his offer.

Czelusiak said the district attorney's office "referred to them (the letter writers) as crackpots."

This suit insures that the name Seta Rampersad will be in the news for months to come.

'Final Payments' author leaves Amherst

By DIANE CLEHANE
Collegian Staff

"Women are in better shape these days," said Mary Gordon, author of Final Payments, in a Collegian interview yesterday. The best-selling author recently completed a semester as a visiting professor at Amherst College, teaching courses in English and creative writing. Her first love, she said, however, is writing fiction.

Gordon's first novel, which appeared on the New York Times best-seller list, focused on women's problems in handling guilt over family obligations. When describing her reasons for writing about these problems that concern women, she said these are the problems that face women of today in all different aspects of their lives.

The main character in Final Payments must deal with the strict upbringing of an Irish Catholic family, and her guilt after she begins a new life when her father dies and her family obligations end. Although Gordon comes from an Irish-Catholic background, she says that in no way is the character in the novel modeled after her own life.

"She evolved from an idea of responsibility, present mostly in our mother's generation of women who took care of the family's sick as their dutiful roles, and who come from that type of background that she does," Gordon said.

The novel contains some insights into the background of the character that Gordon described as being misinterpreted by some readers. Mostly, she said, she has received varied and touching responses to her novel.

"I could not stereotype all the responses that I received from women. The most touching responses came from middle-aged women who felt a closeness to the character. There was also a whole genre of people who felt angry because they thought I was being flippant about the Catholic Church, which I was not trying to be," Gordon said.

Because of her general respect for women and the problems in their lives, Gordon disagrees with the opinion of

'HOW WE DOIN' SO FAR?'

Letters

The night before finals

To the Editor:

T'was the night before finals and all through the place not a coffee cup was clean not a book was left chaste

I was tossing and turning hung up in my sheets
I envisioned anhydrides
as I tried hard to sleep

The caffeine didn't work till I lay down to rest
My eyes were stuck open
Tho I tried my very best

Seems I've been awake forever
Though I've tried hard to sleep
I feel pretty lost —
Somewhere in the deep!

The alarm goes off
Doom seems near at hand
Maybe the computer'll screw up and they'll forget who I am

The sun's coming up and the birds are all singing
My circles are black
And my ears they are ringing

Perhaps if I become Quite suddenly ill
The professor'd excuse me
(Anyone got some pills?)

The exams are passed out and so too am I
My eyelids won't open
Not even if they're pried.

After all night long
I finally get some sleep
I wake up as the professor's alarm goes "beep"

Hand them all in Right now — no delay
My paper is blank
Hell! I think my mind is decayed.

I return to my room and look at the mess
I failed the exam
Christ am I depressed.

Seems I've studied forever and still I can't pass.
Something drastic must be done.
(Should I turn on the gas?)

I feel better now in fact I feel great
My books I have burned and my pencils I did break,

My pens have been strewn
My glasses are smashed
My rulers have all been broken in half.

My calculator lies in a heap on my bed
For all intents and purposes
I'd say it is dead.

My notebooks lay tattered in shreds on the floor
After cramming for hours
I just couldn't take anymore.

Happy holidays, luck with finals

To the Editor:

As you may have read in a recent Collegian, the Trustees voted to increase the University's limit for out-of-state undergraduate students from five to a maximum of 15 percent.

Because the high school from which you graduated may be unaware of this change, would be grateful if you could bring this matter to the attention of the school's Guidance Office. On request, the Freshman Admissions Office (Room 255 Whitmore) can provide you with a one-page information sheet describing the admission profile of students we hope to attract.

Thank you for your interest and cooperation. Good luck with finals and happy holidays.

In God We Trust

To the Editor:

This letter is in response to James Lewis' column (12/12) entitled "The God Complex." The argument Mr. Lewis attempts to forward is deficient in several respects, the most offensive of which is his bastardization of factual data. To set the record straight, so to speak, it is not a historical fact that other cultures and civilizations have not instituted their own lifestyles, values and government on other peoples. In fact, history is ripe with such examples; the Muslim invasions of Europe (800-1683), the Aryan subjugation of India, and the Nazi occupation of Europe; the list in inexhaustable.

Moreover, one would be hard-pressed to claim that the United States has concentrated its industrial might toward the development of destructive weapons.

Mr. Lewis does not realize that while 10-12% of the United States' GNP is devoted to defense—certainly not a "concentration"—the Soviet Union spends 15-20% for the same purposes.

Second, although 200,000 civilians were killed by the atomic blasts at Hiroshima and Nagisaki, (not just Hiroshima) historians estimate that Operation Olympic (the invasion of Japan) would have resulted in over one million casualties. Who was morally right in this situation, Mr. Lewis? We would argue that the United States was not acting simply to protect its own interests, but those of the Chinese, Manchurians, and the Indonesians, all of whom were being invaded by the Japanese.

We would now like to comment on Mr. Lewis' analysis of the Iranian situation. It is filled with generalizations and gross simplifications. First, the U.S. has explored every diplomatic solution, short of military force or a blanket embargo. This country has not instituted any official action that would suggest a desire for war. The Iranian seizure, however, of the embassy, which is our sovereign territory, was a direct act of war.

Moreover, to imply that the U.S. does not care about the fate of the hostages is simply ludicrous. If the United States is as belligerant and as unconcerned as Mr. Lewis suggests, then why hasn't this country initiated any aggressive action against Iran? Certainly, this philosophy would not require us to wait for Khomeini to harm the hostages.

Finally, Mr. Lewis intimates that United State's action should be tempered by the knowledge that the Soviets now support the Iranians. Mr. Lewis, are you implying that we should subvert our interests simply to satisfy the Russians? If this country was to follow this convoluted logic, we would soon be one of the few countries not under direct Soviet influence. Your argument is dangerously reminiscent of the Sonnenfeldt Doctrine, which basically granted the Soviets cate blanche in Europe, and has since been repudiated.

We would suggest, Mr. Lewis, that before you write your next column, you research your subject and quote credible sources. World events are not simply the products of a U.S. conspiracy and we would urge you to broaden your obviously myopic viewpoints. Ignorance is not bliss.

Packing 'em in

Charli Bagli

Every day I drive the "Annie Hauler" for the Hampshire Mall, I get a glimpse of the Cincinnati "Who" concert. All the pushing and shoving to get on the bus is not unlike all the pushing and shoving to get into a concert.

Fortunately, no one has been killed trying to get on the "Annie Hauler." Eleven young people did die in Cincinnati. Their deaths still don't seem very real. I mean with all that's going on in the world; to die at a rock concert? Yet whenever young people die I feel a stab of sadness. Why did these young lives have to end?

Some persons contend that it happened because crowds that attend rock concerts are so drunk and stoned that anything could happen. However, Sgt. Lamping, a patrolman on the scene, stated: "...there was no animosity to police officers. No fighting or anything like that. There was no reason to think the kids would be trampled. And there was no excessive drinking or alcohol."

Others target rock music itself, saying that it inspires immorality or decadence. To most rock music is an expression of everything going on in our heads. It's what we've grown up with, something that's gotten us through high school, college and our parents. In short, it's exciting. And concerts are a time to come together and enjoy it all. As long as it's been around there have been people that have hated its rebellious high energy.

Mark Parchman, who attended the concert said: "It's not valid justification for stopping concerts altogether or boycotting rock albums. I don't feel that music was the cause. To me its the ultimate right-wing answer to the problem — that it's 'jungle' music."

The press has treated the tragedy in one of two ways. It is described as a mystical experience that is beyond comprehension, or, as a natural calamity that strikes without warning. The Globe wonders "can it happen here."

Many young people though, feel that it can be explained. A dozen youths held a vigil at the Riverfront Coliseum the night after the tragedy. Their placards read: "We want answers" and "What Can Replace Eleven Lives." One of them angrily declared "I hear a lot of politicking now but it seems so out of context, where is the worry for the victims?"

The "worry" certainly wasn't on the part of the concert promoters or Coliseum owners. The primary reason for the deaths seems to rest on the seating policy. Seventy-five per cent of the 18,300 seats were put on general admission. This pits every concert-goer against the other in a fight for the best seats. As the Globe reported: "There is growing evidence that the coliseum's general admission festival seating policy has been a powderkeg for some time."

This policy is generally discredited, amongst promoters as dangerous and chaotic. However, it does have a redeeming feature. Selling tickets "general admission" means that a few thousand more persons can be packed into the hall. A few thousand more dollars can be made.

As thousands of young people gathered at the Coliseum early, to get the best seat, secondary mistakes ensured serious problems. The doors to the arena opened 20 — 30 minutes late, and as the crowd surged forward there were only two, of the customary six-to-eight doors, open. In the crush elever persons were left dead.

In the wake of Cincinnati, Boston city officials considered cancelling the "Who" concert. They didn't. I don't know if they should have, but I never doubted that Don Law with his monopoly on Boston rock would have allowed the concert to get away. Not at $15 a seat.

The vibrant rock music that is so much a part of our lives is run by people with dollar signs in their eyes. They don't care about our music but they do care about our money. And they'll pack us in to get it. The officials of the Riverfront Coliseum and the promoters Electric Factory Concerts, should go on trial, for murder.

PORNO: Vague pornography definition increases

By ROD CARVETH
Collegian Staff

Editors Note: Reporter Rod Carveth here analyzes the effects of pornographic medium using laws; an interview with the owner of the Majestic Theatre in Easthampton, which screens pornographic films; and material from studies done on pornography, including a recently completed but yet unpublished study by a UMass professor.

In assessing what standards legally define pornography, Professor James Boylan of the UMass Journalism Studies program said the Supreme Court has often gone by the standard of "we know pornography when we see it."

This ambiguous and capricious standard makes it difficult to adequately deal with pornography as a possible contributor to a larger social problem: violence against women. Misconceptions shroud both the definition of pornography and its subsequent behavioral effects, as interviews from representatives of the legal-journalistic, business and social research communities point out.

Until the 1970's, the prevailing standards concerning obscenity and pornography were established by two legal decisions. In the Roth decision (1957), obscenity was deemed not to enjoy the protections of the First and Fourteenth Amendments. The Fanny Hill decision (1966) provided that a work could be judged pornographic if it was "utterly without redeeming social value."

This vague test proved ineffective in prosecuting pornography cases as a defendant could almost always produce expert testimony that his or her material possessed some measure of redeeming social value.

Even to this day there is no universally recognized standard concerning pornography. "The Supreme Court managed to confuse things about six years ago in Miller v. California," Boylan said.

The result of this 1973 decision was to leave up to contempary community standards what was pornographic. While somewhat confusing, the variation resulting from differing community standards "may be good", according to Boylan, because of the flexibility in application.

Certain misconceptions about the nature of pornography and its audience however, may affect the application of those standards. Chester Yamilkoski, owner of the Majestic Theatre in Easthampton, said in an interview last month that there are "distorted perceptions" as to what constitutes the audience of the X-rated movies that he exhibits.

"Most of our clientele are well-bred and well-behaved," Yamilkoski said and not the "sleazy audience" that is depicted in the media. "Many of our customers are 35 and over and are middle class." Yamilkoski said.

"These customers are free to choose what they want," Yamilkoski said. "We don't have any problems here, because the age is 21 to get in." While the surrounding town and area are not supportive of the theatre, Yamilkoski was able to stifle much of the potential public reaction to his movies when he opened 10 years ago by prescreening his movies for violence.

"If a movie has a lot of violence in it then we won't show it. Sex should always be a beautiful, loving thing, and you want the audience to go away from the film with a good feeling." In addition there are no advertisements outside the theatre and coming attractions' posters face the inside.

The films Yamilkoski shows are "erotica," he said, and "a form of adult education. It's both entertaining and, for some, therapeutic." While Yamilkoski could not speak for all X-rated movie theatres, he was surprised by the concern displayed by such groups as Women Against Pornography.

"The trend is to much better quality films, and much more sophisticated films," Yamilkoski said. "Those involved in the business are trying to upgrade their own industry."

"Young kids shouldn't handle this stuff," he said. 'I don't think kids are ready for it. There's no real reason for our having our age at 21 other than they are more mature then. With maturity, you are better able to distinguish between sex and love." Yamilkoski said he gives his audience a service. "These movies give our customers pleasure. They won't turn them into degenerates."

Social science research on the effects of erotica on human aggression support Yamilkoski's contentions to some extent though, according to UMass Communication Studies Professor Jennings Bryant, little research has been conducted on the effects of erotica on deviant sexual behavior. "You can't do satisfactory experimental work in this area because none of the measures used, such as rated desire, are convincing," Brvant said.

Research done by the Commission on Obscenity and Pornography revealed in 1970 that there was no link between pronography and anti-social behavior. That Commission report, however, has recently come under severe attack. Research conducted since the report has clearer results, Bryant said.

Just what pornography is, and how severe it is as a social problem, has yet to be determined, given the present state of both legal rulings, and social science research. Groups such as Women Against Pornography may find it difficult in the future to fight an enemy no one is quite sure about. Pornography may not even be the enemy, insofar as violence against women in concerned.

many feminist authors that women are angry about their plight in society. "Sure, anyone who is not angry is foolish, but I also think that to stop at anger is not the right thing to do. Anger is a bridge from something to something else. It's not a productive or enjoyable way to live your life. Today women are really puzzled about how we can have fuller lives," she said.

"I think what women are trying to do today is lead a balanced life between love and work. I feel that the period of anger that women feel is somewhat over." Then, with a smile she added, "However, women are always angry at the stupidity of men, which seems to be a perennial phenomenon. But I don't think that is a total state of anger but more one of thoughtfulness."

Gordon noted what seemed to be at the root of her consciousness and insight of the feelings of contemporary women by describing what she called "a particular phenomenon of women today that evolved from the realization that we were a lot less willing to give up family for career.

Currently at work on her second novel, Gordon plans to focus her future works on the challenges of how women create a life of integrity and balance.

After teaching for eight years, Gordon now plans to take a year off to complete her novel, and work on short stories. Her rapport with her students has meant a great deal to her she said. She spoke about her feelings of attachment towards her students and expressed in sadness how she feels each time she must leave those students to whom she has grown close to.

"It's one of the saddest things about teaching. It's like having a group of people that you love periodically enter and leave your life. There always are people that you are really drawn to and it's hard when you get a postcard from a student sav, in five years, and remember them as your friends."

Gordon's college years were spent at Barnard College as an undergraduate. She describes herself as entering the college "incredibily ignorant to different ways of life," She attended graduate school at Syracuse University.

Published in Harpers, Mademoiselle, New York Review of Books and Redbook, Gordon exuded a wonderfully humane quality for all people, not only women. Francis, her dog who she continually spoke to during the interview looked at her with understanding, the same understanding with which Mary Gordon looks at the world.

Hot F Tunas grab hockey title

By DONNA SULLIVAN
Collegian Staff

The Hot F Tunas had a two man advantage for a while in the third period but failed to capitalize as What the Puck took the intramural ice hockey championship held last night at Greenfield Ice Arena.

For about three minutes What the Puck had one then two of their scorers in the penalty box and still held down a 3-0 win th take first place. The Puck was successful in shutting off the Tunas leading scorer Alvin Paulson.

According to Dusty Burke, director of the intramural hockey program, the two finalists are probably the best two teams the league has ever produced. "The level of ability out there was superb," he said.

The first goal was scored by Mike Staid on a power play with five minutes and seventeen seconds left in the first period. They had it won there but Doug Limone, after suffering a severe gash under the eye, came through with goal number two, ten minutes and thirty seconds into the second period.

Chris Lowey, an ex-varsity player, wrapped up the What the Puck scoring with the third goal halfway through the third period.

The two championship teams came from a field of twenty teams and from a single elimination tournament of eight teams.

Indoor trackemen face URI and UNH

By JANE WOLFSON
Collegian Staff

Competing in their last meet of the decade the UMass men's indoor track team will travel to the University of New Hampshire to take on the University of Rhode Island and UNH in a tri-meet tomorrow afternoon at 12:00.

"Rhode Island is extremely well balanced and is the clear cut favorite to win the meet," explained Minutemen Coach Ken O'Brien.

"URI will be most dominant in the field and middle distance events. Strong performances by Steve Hyder and Kirk Skinner in the weight events will be critical for us."

UMass began their season by losing to the University of Connecticut and Seton Hall two weeks ago. UNH has yet to come up with a victory while URI is 3-1.

The Minutemen should look strongest in the distance events. Their strongest competition will come from New Hampshire's Gary Crossan, this years winner of the cross country Yankee Conference Championships, and Guy Stearns who finished fifth in the same race.

Distance runners for UMass include tri-captain Steve MacDougall, Rick Walls, Mike Doiron, Rick Doiron, Chris Omeltchenko and Jay Legere.

Minutemen pole vaulters Jim Larabee and Jay Buckley are definitely going to have their work cut out for them when they face Bill Hotley and Mark Strayderman of URI, the two top pole vaulters in New England, according to their coach William Falk.

Hurdlers Ed Iwanowicz and Jeff Rasku will be seeing their toughest competition from URI sophomore Bob Holden.

Representing UMass in the middle distance events will include Rick Cady and tri-captain Rick Trunfio in the 400 and Rich Hoag and bob Pearson in the 600.

Sophomore Bill DeVarney will be called on for the dash and the long jump with junior Jeff Durant. Both will be crucial events for the Minutemen, according to O'Brien.

Minutemen rally falls short, 77-70

By STEVE ZACK
Collegian Staff

The Bentley Falcons aided by a 15 point halftime lead, held off a late Minuteman surge and came away with a 77-70 victory last night before a crowd of 2,000 at the Cage.

The Minutemen opened the game on an up note, scoring the first six points of the contest, capped off with a Jay Stewart slam dunk after grabbing the rebound from a Jeff Bierly shot. But the Falcons answered the Minutemen back wth eight unanswered points to grab an 8-6 lead with 15 minutes remaining in the half.

During the next five minutes of play, the lead changed hands nine times and was tied an additional three times with UMass being on the brighter side of a 20-18 score with 9:47 left in the half.

Bentley's Joe Betley sank a baseline jumper to knot the game at 20. Then the Falcons added seven more points to take the lead for good, 27-20, with eight minutes to go in the first stanza.

With 4:30 remaining in the half, Bentley ran off a 10 point spree to open things up, and at the half the Falcons had a 41-26 advantage.

Causing problems for the Minutemen was the inability to get the ball inside on offense against Bentley's zone defense.

"They (Bentley) had a 2-3 zone," remarked Minutemen coach Ray Wilson. "That 2-3 was designed so that we wouldn't hurt them inside. That's the first zone weve seen for a whole game this year."

The Minutemen came out for the second half with revenge on their minds. The hoopmen outscored Bentley 12-6 at the outset to cut the Falcons' margin to nine, 47-38, with 13 minutes to go in the game.

For the next several minutes the teams traded baskets and at the 13:19 mark, trailing by 15 points once again, Tom Witkos hit a foul shot to begin the final Minutemen attempt for victory.

The cagers tacked on nine additional unanswered points to the Witkos foul shot to cut the Bentley lead to only five points with 2:48 remaining in the contest. Of the ten points scored by the Minutemen, six came from the foul line, two on a Bill Morrison basket, and two on a Tom Witkos steal and layup.

The final two minutes plus saw the Minutemen's luck, as well as the ball game, slip away. With 2:30 left in the game, the Minutemen had a chance to cut the Bentley lead to three points, but turned the ball over.

With 2:15 left, Bentley's Andy Kupec hit a foul shot to up the Falcons lead to six. UMass' Danny Wright answered Kupec back with two free throws of his own with only 1:49 remaining to cut the visitor's edge to four.

Wright was the bright spot for the Minutemen on the evening, grabbing a game high 10 rebounds along with 10 points.

"I'm happy that he's coming of age," remarked Wilson. "This last half may have been the best twenty minutes he's played."

With only 33 seconds remaining, and down by four points, the Minutemen were forced to foul the Falcons in order to gain possession. Tom Witkos fouled Bentley's Gerrit Bandison hoping that the Falcon would botch the free throw attempt but it was not to be. Bandison sank the first of two attempts to give Bentley a five point edge and the game.

The Minutemen resume play tomorrow at 2:00 against the Harvard Crimson in Cambridge.

Gymnasts renew rivalry

By JAY BRIGHTMAN
Collegian Staff

One of the East's top collegiate women's gymnastic rivalries will be renewed tommorrow at 1:00 in Curry Hicks Cage when UMass hosts Penn State. Both Penn State and UMass have won national gymnastic titles in the past decade and in the eight previous meets the series has been a standoff with both squads winning four times.

In the past three years Penn State has placed among the top three finishers in the national finals. Last season Penn State finished with a 12-0 record, won the Eastern Association of Intercollegiate Athletics for Women, and finished second in the national finals.

"This is the best and most experienced team we've ever had," said Penn State Coach Judi Avener. The team has three returning seniors: Ann Carr, Jan Anthony and Lynn Samuels. Ann Carr won five gold medals at the Pan-Am Games in 1975 but was unable to compete in the 1976 Olympics. Also, she has won the all-around event twice at the National Championships. Jan Anthony and Lynn Samuels placed sixth and third respectively in vaulting at the Nationals last year. Another member of their team, Marge Foster, last year placed 12th in the all-around event at the World University Games. "This year's team is hungry again and wants to win the nationals," said Coach Avener.

Against this impressive team UMass will need some solid performances from their top gymnasts. Lisa Martin has been working on a layout double twist which consists of doing two 360's in the air after completing a series of handsprings. For the past ten days the gymnasts have been smoothing over the rough spots of their last meet.

"This meet is the biggest of the year for us. We'll be using this meet as a measuring stick for next semester," said UMass Coach Virginia Evans. "Our team is ready and looking forward to this meet. The first competitor in each event will set the pace for the rest of the team. So, I feel the team should be able to get the team score into the 130's," said Coach Evans.

Following the Penn State meet the next home meet will be February 13th when UMasm hosts Southern Connecticut at Curry Hicks Cage.

Hoopwomen visit Owls

By MIKE ESTRADA

The UMass women's basketball team will take their 3-1 act on the road tomorrow night when they face Central Connecticut State College at 6:00 p.m. in New Britain.

One would hope that one-point games will not be the regular practice of the Minutewomen. The average fan or sportswriter just can't take it. But it does make for exciting basketball.

In its last two games UMass has gone from heartbreak to "ain't-it-sweet basketball." On Monday, a shot at the buzzer by Texas A&M silenced the crowd at the Cage 75-74. At URI Tuesday, freshman Val DePaolo hit two free throws to nail down one over the WRams 76-75.

And the season is only four games old.

Tomorrow is the last game in December for UMass, and as can be expected, coach Mary Ann Ozdarski is not yet settled on a regular starting line-up. DePaolo started in place of regular guard Sherry Collins Tuesday, bit Ozdarski has made it clear that this year's substitute squad has 14 players, not starters and substitutes.

"Our bench did a super job against URI," Odzdarski said. "DePaolo (with a strong 7 point performance against A&M) deserved the start. But Sherry Collins played her best intercollegiate game ever coming off the bench."

Central Connecticut at 3-1 is another in a long list of formidable opponents for the Minutewomen. After an opening loss to Northeastern, Central has rolled off three straight wins against Bridgewater State, Westfield State, and Eastern Connecticut.

Coached by nine-year veteran Brenda Reilly, Central lacks the depth existing on the UMass squad. Center Donna Fiedorowisc is by far the team's leading scorer, netting 38 against Northeastern and 32 against Eastern Conn. Forward Irene Pierce is next with a 14-point per game average.

If Feidorowisc is lost, so are the hopes of Central Connecticut. She returned to the line-up last year (after a 73-54 decision against UMass) to help her squad turn a 1-5 season into 13-8.

"We're only worried about how our team plays," Ozdarski said. "On every team there is going to be an outstanding player." Ozdarski admitted she knew very little about Central but would start with their strength (man-to-man defense) and adjust with the flow of the game.

NOTES: Ozdarski's early observation of star Sue Peters' role this year seems to hold true. Peters, Ozdarski said, would have a great year without having to handle most of the team's scoring. The senior has played superbly while only scoring 14.2 points per game. She scored 23.4 per game last season. ...Junior Julie ready leads the team in scoring with a 26 point game average.

Au revoir

Yes folks, as you may have already guessed by the title, this is the kid's final column. (Please try to hold down your applause till the end-if you ever get that far). Before I start this thing, I just want you all to know that I tried, I really, really tried to make this into a different kind of Goodbye Column.

I really wanted this to be anything but one of those bland, traditional GBC's, where the sentimental author begins with fond reflections of his humble beginnings at UMass, then chronicles several of his good times here, then proceeds to say so long to everyone from Metawampee to his bowling teacher (who he mentions only because he'll get an "A" if he does) before concluding the whole thing with a passage from some absurd song or poem which is supposed to capsulize his career here.

I wasn't going to give in to all that. My farewell was going to be different. I was going to go out fighting, with guns blazing, knocking down every institution around that makes this university the bad joke that it is. I was all kinds of psyched to blast the university administration for it's ineptness, the student body for it's apathy and the athletic department for it's sheer stupidity.

I was all set to say things like "This place is really going down the tubes. I'm getting out of this $&0! fruitfarm just in time." Or "In my four years here, I've seen this place go from a respectable school to the laughing stock of the East coast."

I was really going to lay it on the athletic department for getting us kicked out of the ECAC, losing the hockey team, and allowing the excellent program that existed when I got there to turn into the debacle that we have today.

These were the kind of words that I thought I could leave you with. After a little bit of thought (not much mind you) I concluded that those could not possibly be the words and phrases I would use to sum up my four long years here.

For some strange, unexplained reason, when you get ready to depart from this place the bad memories (and believe me, there were lots of em) somehow sink to the bottom of the pond and the good memories always have a way of rising to the surface.

For example, I can still remember my very first assignment for the Collegian. It was the Spring of 1976, and there I was, George O'Brien, "on the road with Fan Gaudetter and the men's golf team." It wasn't the biggest beat in the world, but I learned a lot and I had fun at the same time.

UMass athletics and I have both seen a lot of changes since the old days, not all of them for the best. I have seen many events in my years here that have made me cringe, but I've also seen countless games and many athletes that have made me tremendously proud of this university.

My four-year stint with this newspaper has been one of inestimable value. I have learned a lot about writing and even more about people. Along the way, I've made a lot of friends, and I wish nothing but the best of luck and a happy life for every one of them.

As for me, well, I'm heading for I don't know where. (a small town next to Deerfield). There are times when I wish I could stay at the zoo forever, I mean the place has been pretty good to me. However, reality has a habit of asserting itself, and I am reminded of the final lines from my favorite Robert Frost poem;

The woods are lovely, dark and deep,
But I have promises to keep
And miles to go before I sleep,
And miles to go before I sleep.

Well, I guess there's nothing much left to do but say adios. So goodbye Metawampee, take it easy Lev.

University to go after business money

By GAYLE YOUNG
Special to the Collegian

Suffering from what has been called an identity crisis, UMass has undertaken an ambitious project which will increase its involvement in the state's economy and raise some much-needed funds at the same time.

UMass officials are expected to announce sometime in January that it is raising $5 million from private industries to be used for the engineering school on the Amherst campus, in an effort to shift the focus of research towards industry and commerce as well as the traditional areas of agriculture and humanities. Officials say the project has the backing of the Massachusetts congressional delegation and Gov. Edward J. King, who last year ordered University trustees to cut their budget request by 10 percent. Officials say they hope to encourage Mass. Businesses to give money to UMass in return for research, advice in management and specially trained students.

"It is a mutually helpful partnership," said Amherst campus Chancellor Henry Koffler of the University and state businesses. "Industry has to be concerned about what UMass does because they get their main source of manpower from us. Studies show half of our graduates remain to work in the state. We have a lot of expertise, and faculty and students with insight who can help develop industry."

Koffler, who took office in September, called the current University fund-raising drive for the school of Engineering a pilot project, which will determine future UMass-industry relationships and said UMass is a forerunner in establishing such ties.

"Other schools are definitely watching us," he said. "But, for it to work, a University must be in a state where the economy lends itself to industry and growth. Labor-heavy industries and agriculture are moving out of Massachusetts but they are being replaced with engineering and high technology. Educated people can only stimulate this growth. We are making a conscientious effort to make the University more useful to society."

The move to create a bond between UMass and state industry comes in the face of budget cuts for UMass and stabilization after a ten-year period of growth of the three campus system. The Amherst campus, first opened in 1867 as a land grant agricultural college, now serves 18,000 undergraduate and 6,000 graduate students in schools of Art, Education, Humanitities, Business and Science, Koffler said.

Shah holes up on Panama isle

By GORDON D. MOTT
Associated Press

PANAMA CITY, Panama — Panamanian gunboats, aviation authorities and armed guards laid down tight security yesterday around Contadora, the idyllic tropical isle where the deposed Shah of Iran is making the latest stop in his global wanderings.

Officials ordered the Panamanian resort island—a showpiece tourist spot for white sandy beaches, blue marlin fishing and casino gambling—closed to reporters.

A source at the island's 150-room resort hotel said Panamanian gunboats were cruising the waters around the twosquare-mile island, in the Pacific Ocean 35 miles southeast of Panama City. Air traffic officials were making close checks on anyone who wanted to get to Contadora.

Along with the hotel, the lush, densely wooded island has some two dozen privately owned homes, a small grocery store and roads traversed only by golf carts and the hotel's small open-air buses.

The source, who declined to be identified by name, said Panamanian guards armed with automatic weapons were stationed around the oceanside ranch-style home in which the shah was staying with his wife, the Empress Farah Diba.

The home, furnished with worn Oriental rugs, an oversized dining table, Panamanian folk art objects and a minimal amount of other furniture, belongs to Panamanian businessman Gabriel Lewis Galindo, former ambassador to Washington. It has three or four bedrooms.

Galindo bought the island for his wife in 1966 for $30,000, although Contadora, one of some 100 islands in the Pearl Islands chain, is now owned by a government tourism corporation.

Informed sources here said Gen. Omar Torrijos, head of Panama's national guard and former chief of state, was expected to pay a call on the shah, who came here Saturday after leaving an Air Force hospital in Texas. He had been recuperating in Texas for two weeks after undergoing gallbladder and cancer treatment at a New York hospital.

A doctor on the island, who also asked not to be named, said the 60-year-old shah appeared "very weak and barely able to talk" at a brief news conference after his arrival Saturday.

"I am very grateful to the Panamanian people and Gen. Torrijos," the shah told a small group of reporters after arriving with his wife and eight security guards at the island's small airstrip.

The shah did not say how long he planned to stay on Contadora, but he and his party brought a huge amount of luggage with them.

After fleeing the revolution in Iran last January, the shah went first to Egypt and Morocco. It was his arrival in New York in October that sparked the takeover of the U.S. Embassy in Tehran, where Islamic militants are still holding 50 Americans hostage.

Iranian authorities said yester-day the shah's departure from the United States was a success for Iran in its confrontation with Washington. They indicated it might help ease the 3-day-old crisis.

CONTADORA ISLAND, Panama (AP)— The exiled Shah of Iran said Sunday he feels "at home" on this tropical island and hoped his departure from the United States would speed the release of 50 American hostages held at the U.S. Embassy in Tehran.

Asked at a news conference if he planned to stay in Panama, deposed Shah Mohammad Reza Pahlavi said, "This is obviously within our minds because such a surrounding and such hospitality is not very easy to match in very many cases."

If the situation in Iran were to "go back to normal," he said, "obviously one would travel one way or another, but this is some place we know at least how we will be treated."

"I would like to express our deep gratitude for the very generous invitation of the Republic of Panama and President (Aristides) Royo," the shah added. "Since we set foot on this soil, we have felt at home."

Royo, who appeared with the shah at the news conference, was asked why Panama had agreed to permit the shah to live here and he replied, "We felt compelled to contribute to peace in the world."

He said he had not considered the possibility of reprisals by Iran's revolutionary government or Iranian extremists and added, "We are not afraid of them. Panama is ready to protect itself and the shah."

The shah fled from the revolution in Iran in January, stopping in Egypt, Morocco, and the Bahamas before moving to Mexico. He flew to New York from Mexico Oct. 22 for cancer treatment and gallstone surgery.

THE REACTION:

Relations to ease?

By MAUREEN JOHNSON
Associated Press

TEHRAN, Iran — Iran claimed yesterday that the shah's flight to Panama was a defeat for the United States and a partial acceptance of Iranian demands in the deadlock over the 50 American Embassy hostages.

The statements by the ruling Revolutionary Council and Foreign Minister Sadegh Ghotbzadeh appeared to signal that the Iranian side is eager to find a way out of the 43-day-old crisis, now that the deposed monarch is out of the United States' grasp.

In his most conciliatory statement yet, Ghotbzadeh said, "We will try to do our best to defuse the crisis."

He also said some hostages might be freed by Christmas, and he played down talk of putting the hostages on trial as "spies."

At the same time, however, the Revolutionary Council denounced as "one-sided" Saturday's decision by the International Court of Justice calling for release of the hostages.

Since Moslem militants seized the embassy Nov. 4, they and the government had demanded that the United States hand over the deposed Shah Mohammad Reza Pahlavi in exchange for the hostages. But Pahlavi flew Saturday from Texas to Panama for at least a temporary stay.

A Revolutionary Council statement broadcast yesterday on Tehran Radio said Iran had "forced the U.S. government to retreat, reduce its support of the deposed shah and, accepting defeat, compelled him to flee."

Some observers believed the council might now consider the shah's move, combined with some kind of hearing by an international tribunal on "espionage" and other U.S. "crimes," as sufficient to free at least most of the captives.

Ghotbzadeh told reporters the international "grand jury" investigating the U.S. role in Iran would begin a hearing about Jan. 1 or 2, and that it would last about two weeks.

"The hostages will appear as witnesses, but not as the accused," he said.

Ghotbzadeh said it was possible some hostages would be freed by Christmas and — despite angry declarations by the militants who want to try the hostages as spies — said the authorities were not currently debating setting a trial date.

He spoke carefully when asked whether he could sell his approach to the students — who have called for action against the hostages now that the shah has left the United States.

The minister told reporters that

This semester — more than academia

By DEBRA ROTH
and ROB STEIN

The semester opened with the library closed, ended with the library open, and as we leave, the Shah of Iran makes a new home in Panama.

Between these events, a semester flew by.

It probably comes as no surprise to find that just Friday one of the world's tallest libraries reopened for limited use.

The library hasn't been our only diversion this semester. To add to the disintegrating image of the University, buildings including the Campus Center Garage, the Fine Arts Center, the Southwest Residential Area, and others were riddled and plagued by faulty construction.

Some famous types showed their faces around campus.

Jane Fonda and Tom Hayden came to talk, and veteran groups were joined by members of the John Birch society to voice opposition to their appearance and the Campaign for Economic Democracy.

Halloween brought more than ghost stories. The vandalism and drunken disorder marked the worst Halloween in recent years, totalling more than several thousand dollars in damages.

This type of incident spurred the publication of UMass Horrors, in Boston Magazine. The image conjured-up by the article seemed to be oneof roaming bands of drunken students raping, vandalizing, acting racist, and generally reeking havoc on the town and campus.

Throughout the semester the news were filled with Iran-related stories and there seemed to be a sudden upsurge in nationalistic feelings on campus.

In fact, the situation in Iran has probably been the most important news this semester, on-campus and nationally. But although campuses across the country were plagued by protests and violence, both pro and anti-shah, UMass was quiet in this area—except for an all day peaceful debate in the Campus Center last month and a protest when immigration officials interviewed Iranian students in the Amherst post office.

More stuff. The cry went up around campus around for improved lighting. This need sparked a rally outside the Student Union during which students protested hikes in room, board and tuition fees.

Following the rally, a candlelight vigil was held at the chancellor's house calling for increased lighting.

There was also another battle between the Student Senate and the administration over allocation of the Student Activities Trust Fund. After a lot of rhetoric, a few letters to the editor, and several weeks, the Student Senate retained control over the fund.

On a dimmer note, the Chancellor organized a special committee following faculty protests of a rising tide of anti-semetic actions on campus.

On the anti-nuclear scene, a record breaking attendance marked an anti-nuke rally in New York. Busloads of UMass students went down to enjoy the music of Bonnie Raitt, Jackson Browne and others and to hear the speeches of Jane Fonda and Tom Hayden. UMies also took part in this semester's Seabrook occupation, though they didn't occupy.

And then of course, the Pope. He came and he spoke and then he left. The event cost the city of Boston nearly one million dollars.

Teddy Kennedy calls his own bluff, declares his candidacy, enters the race way out in front only to succumb to the President's handling of the Iranian Crisis.

The mystery of the dead pigeons remains just that. Earlier in the semester the campus was riddled with dead and dying pigeons whose death was thought by some to be caused by workers in the Physical plant. After several articles in the Collegian and not alot of concern nothing much happened.

Oh yes, there was also a rally protesting nothing but isn't there always?

To break-upall the hard news. Van Morrison, Talking Heads, Holly Near, Chaim Potok, The Nutcracker Suite, Fourteen Brilliant Colors, Just Friends of 1923, spoke and played. Uncle Vanya, The Babes, Twyla Tharp, Chapter Two, Bonnie Raitt and Rick Derringer also appeared. New Wave bands, the Sinceros and the Motels packed the Blue Wall in early November for the first Weekend of havoc hits UMass

By CAROL ROSENBERG

Over $6,000 worth of vandalism, larceny and motor vehicle damage, coupled with two assaults were reported by UMass police this weekend.

The bulk of the incidents took place in the Southwest Residential Area late Friday night and Saturday, according to UMass Sgt. Mary Dumas.

Police are investigating an assault with a dangerous weapon Sunday morning in which a UMass student was believed stabbed in the shoulder at Washington tower.

The University Fire Department reported to police a student had been stabbed and was bleeding, after responding to an emergency call, Dumas said.

"It was an enormous crowd situation. The fire department was there. There were crowds in the building, in the stairwells, and the fire department came upon this guy who was bleeding, said he was stabbed," she said.

"Witnesses were saying he had been stabbed," the sergeant said.

"Students were intoxicated, Numbers of people were interviewed as to who saw what, and who was around. Statements were taken from a number of people," Dumas said.

Dumas reported large amounts of broken glass throughout the dormitory.

Police are investigating the stabbing and have no suspects.

In another incident around 2:30 a.m. Saturday in Washington tower, police reported over $1000 in damage. Plate glass windows on three sides of the tower, a plexiglass window inside the lobby, and an intercom system were damaaged, she said.

While patrolmen were investigating the damage, the drivers door of a police cruiser was also kicked in, causing damage valued at $75, she reported.

Several false alarms were also reported throughout the weekend in Washington and Baker dorms. "They had diminished and now they're back up again. The fire

Students greet re-opened library with skepticism, relief

By SEAN HARVEY
Collegian Staff

Student reaction to the opening of the main tower of the University Library to all undergraduates last Friday seemed positive, but many students questioned the decision to open the library this late in the semester.

"It seems like they had some other reason to open it than just to be accommodating to students," said Peter Tuchman, a senior economics major. "It seems sort of useless to open it at this point," he said.

The library was closed on Aug. 31, after a report completed by the engineering firm of Loomis and Loomis, Inc. of Windsor, Ct. said there was a danger of bricks falling from the facade of the building.

LibraryDirector Richard J. Talbot said the library was not opened until Dec. 3- for limited access, then because a state building inspector could not issue a certificate of occupancy until all safety regulations were met.

On entering through the northeast entrance near the Student Union Building, students walk through the space where the card catalog was and past brick columns to a desk where they must show a five-college ID.A library employee at this desk keeps a running count of how many students pass through the library. There is a 500 persons limit.

As of yesterday at 4 p.m. 1,637 students had passed through since 8 a.m. last Friday, with a highpoint Saturday at 4 p.m. when there were 308 persons in the building. The first floor of the library is closed. Students check out books at a desk on the main floor where in the past there were glass display tables with photographs of old UMass buildings.

The area on the main floor outside of the brick columns is closed off to all persons with chicken wire put up between each pillar.

Some students said they felt the closing of the library this semester hurt their scholastic averages.

"I think a lot of people weren't as motivated because their major study area wasn't available," said a sophomore Economics major last night in a study carrel on the 20th floor.

"I think it's about time they opened the library," said Anne Levin. I think it really lowered my average and a lot of other people's. It used to be a standard thing that

Federal support to Chrysler undecided

WASHINGTON (AP)— The first session of the 96th Congress goes into its final scheduled week today with many legislators still undecided whether to extend a financial helping hand to the Chrysler Corp.

The House, which took up the Chrysler aid measure last week, will resume debate and begin considering amendments Tuesday. "It looks okay, but it's going to be uphill," said one supporter, speaking anonymously.

In the Senate, prospects for action on Chrysler im proved when a deadlock on the "windfall profits" tax bill was broken in a push toward approval of an oil tax measure today. That would allow a House-Senate conference committee to start work as early as tomorrowon reconciling differences over the two chambers' separate versions of the oil tax bill.

The longer windfall profits goes on, the more of a time squeeze there is on Chrysler, said Sen. Donald W. Riegle Jr., D-Mich., who is leading the Senate fight for federal loan guarantees to the failing automaker.

Vietnam claims leader was 'desperate'

BANGKOK, Thailand (AP)- Vietnam yesterday claimed last week's appearance of Pol Pot before a group of Japanese journalists showed that Cambodia's shadowy ousted premier was in a "desperate position" in his guerrilla war against the Vietnamese backed Cambodian government.

Nhan Dan, Vietnam's Communist Party newspaper, labeled the news conference "a farce jointly staged by China and Japan...in the hope of breathing life into a rotten political corpse."

Pol Pot's reported meeting with reporters at a guerrilla base near the Thai-Cambodian frontier was his first public appearance since he was ousted last January by a Vietnamese-led invasion force.

Italy moves to counter terrorist activity

ROME (AP)— The Italian government, faced with spreading urban terrorism, has proposed stiff new measures in its anti-terror war, including mandatory life sentences for the killers of judges and policemen.

The new measures, proposed Saturday by Premier Francesco Cossiga's Cabinet, must be approved by Parliament before they can become law.

Recent bold terrorist attacks included last week's mass "kneecapping" by leftist terrorists who wounded 10 persons at a business school in Turin.

Fishing industry to receive $10M

WASHINGTON (AP)—The Commerce Department announced yesterday the availability of $10 million in federal grants to help develop the U.S. fishing industry.

Richard A. Frank, administrator of the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration, said fund applications may be made by any person or group, including industry, universities and state and local governments.

"We are emphasizing regionally oriented projects that will remove economic and technological impediments restricting the use of non traditional species of fish and aid in the development and strengthening of the U.S. fishing industry," Frank said.

'Harassment' drives out transmit manager

BOSTON (AP)—Robert Foster may quit next year as general manager of the Massachusetts Bay Transportation Authority, according to a report yesterday.

The Boston Sunday Globe quoted "reports from inside the MBTA hierarchy" as saying that Foster will leave in early 1980.

According to the newspaper, Foster reportedly told friends that he is fed up with the "harassment" of the MBTA's Advisory Board and that he realizes that he will never be able to function effectively as head of the transit system.

Support grows for defense increase

By EVANS WITT
Associated Press

NEW YORK — At least partly because of the Iranian crisis, public support for increased spending on the military and national security has reached the highest point of the decade, an Associated PressNBC News poll says.

The poll results suggest President Carter will find substantial support among Americans for the major increases he proposed last week in the Defense Department's budget next year.

"Recent events in Iran have been a vivid reminder of the need for a strong and united America — a nation ... which need not bluff or posture in the quiet exercise of its strength," Carter said Dec. 12, announcing his proposal for increases in defense spending for the next five years.

The public apparently agrees with the president's objectives.

Fifty-one percent said the U.S. defense budget should be increased, while only 9 percent said it should be cut. Thirty-one percent favored holding spending at existing levels. Another 9 percent of the 1,595 adults questioned nationwide by telephone on Dec. 11 and 12 were not sure.

This is the highest level of support for greater defense spending at any time in the 1970s.

In 1971, while the Vietnam War was raging, only 11 percent of the public — in a Louis Harris poll — backed increased defense spending, while 49 percent called for budget cuts. Forty percent supported no change in the spending level.

In 1976, another Harris poll found 28 percent support for increased military spending, 30 percent for less and 42 percent for no change.

As recently as last September, the AP-NBC News poll found 38 percent supporting increased spending, 16 percent favoring cuts and 36 percent favoring no change. The remainder were not sure.

Carter has proposed increases of more than 4 percent above the level of inflation for defense spending. These increases would, he said, go for improving strategic forces, upgrading military units in Europe and in the Pacific, modernizing the Navy and improving the military's ability to respond quickly to local crises like the one in Iran.

The growing support for increased defense spending seems linked in part to a greater fear of war among the American people.

Twenty-nine percent of those questioned now think a war involving the United States is very likely within the next three years. Forty two percent say such a conflict is somewhat likely and 24 percent said one is not likely at all. Five percent were not sure.

This is roughly three times the level of fear of war found a year ago in an AP-NBC News survey. It is down only slightly — about three percentage points — from the finding of the AP-NBC News survey three weeks ago.

As with every sample survey, the results of the AP-NBC News poll can vary from the opinions of all those with telephones across the country because of chance variations in the sample.

Illegal immigrants pose socio-economic problem for N.E. states

HARTFORD (AP)— The apparent increase in the number of illegal immigrants in the Northeast could create a "permanent underclass" of people with no way out of poverty, a report says.

The new study prepared for the Coalition of Northeastern Governors also says U.S. policy on illegal immigrants fails to take into account the problems of the Northeast.

Without offering solutions, the report by Eugene F. Sofer of the coalition's Policy Research Center in Washington says the presence of illegal immigrants provides a "complex issue" for the region's governors.

The report, requested by New York Gov. Hugh Carey, says the Northeast was able to assimilate European immigrants earlier this century because they could participate in the political process and take advantage of public services.

"Illegal immigrants can do neither without fear of arrest and deportation," the report says.

Yet they "use social services and, to an unknown degree, represent direct costs to state and local governments in the region," it adds.

While noting that reliable figures on the number of illegal immigrants are unavailable, the report says settlement patterns for legal immigrants indicate that about two thirds of illegal aliens will settle in New York, California, New Jersey, Illinois, Texas and Massachusetts.

It is also "likely" that New York, New Jersey and Connecticut receive the bulk of the illegal immigrants from the Caribbean, the report says.

Gov. Ella Grasso, chairwoman of the coalition, said the report "demonstrates the urgent need for increased state attention to immigration policymaking, administration and enforcement."

She said that although immigration policy is created by the federal government, state and local governments feel the impact of the policy and "are helpless to deal with its effects."

"The Northeast is just beginning to realize the extent of the burdens placed upon its economic and social structure" by illegal immigrants, she said.

The coalition includes governors of seven states: New York, New Jersey, Massachusetts, Connecticut, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island and Vermont.

Carey said the report showed that illegal immigration "cannot be treated simply as a concern of the Southwest."

"The growing presence of illegal aliens in the Northeast creates important consequences for the entire region," he said, adding that there was not enough "serious attention" given to documenting the number of illegal immigrants or their cost to the region.

Citing a report prepared by the Tri-State Regional Planning Commission and based on figures from the U.S. Immigration and Naturalization Service, Sofer says in his study that New York, New Jersey and Connecticut are the home of 1.8 million illegal aliens. About 1.5 million are in New York, 300,000 in New Jersey and 7,000 in Connecticut, the figures show.

Ski trip an experience

For five weeks during every intersession since you've been at UMass with a vision in your head: miles of mountains cloaked in white satin, the swoosh of powder, the taste of hot spiced wine after a day of skiing. While facing the daily work routine for five weeks to earn your keep, all you can think of is the final six days when you will join the UMass Ski Club for their annual exodus to Sugarbush Mountain in Warren, Vt.

The trip is nervonna. Unleashed from the constraints of work or school, hundreds of UMass students descend to the mountain in multi colored ski gard, tackling new challenges, making new friends. You are not surrounded by this mass of UMies as you are when racing through the Campus Center to class- you are immersed in them; they are your skifellows and your comrades. Together on the spruce-speckled slopes, you are not too busy to say hello. The sun bakes the mountain and its warmth fills you. You are not rushed.

And when the sun sinks behind the mountain the crisp air turns biting and the chairlifts close down, your day has just dawned. The UMass contingent- red-nosed and refreshed-packs into vans and buses and cars and heads back to the lodges, where the hot wine, shared adventures and hearty laughter await.

Dinnertime arrives and you are famished. You have been darting down the slopes all day long, you have laced your way through tree patches, you have covered the mountain from one end to the other, and you are hungry. More wine and warm food arrive. The meal served is like any dining commons fare-only you don't notice. You are too busy smiling, laughing, radiating with a hundred other wind-burnt faces.

After resting at dinner, you feel recharged with energy and you are ready for the evening-a long, active, music-filled night. You might sit in a room with your newly-made friends, drink even more wine, play the guitar, dance and share some jokes. Or a dozen of you may squeeze into some pour lout's Maverick and head for a disco. You were skiing all day and now you will dance all night. The gaiety, the laughter, the shared moments continue.

Suddenly, it's 4 o'clock on a Friday afternoon, the lifts have closed and it's time to head back to Amherst. Where did the week fly, you wonder. No matter, the car trip home stretches it out a bit more. You are still laughing, still drinking wine as you spot the Southwest towers driving into UMass. School will begin in a day or so, but you're prepared-you're revitalized.

After all, you've just spent a week at Sugarbush Mountain with the UMass Ski Club.

Christmas:

Hadley woman recalls the way it used to be

By MARGE FIORE
Collegian Staff

in her drafty, old house filled with cubbyholes, sliding doors, and knicknacks, Mrs. Doheny H. Sessions leaned closer to the fire as she recalled her childhood Christmases.

Sessions, 74, is the owner of the oldest farm in Hadley, out on Rt. 47 across the road from the historic Huntington House.

Sessions lives in the old farmhouse now, with three cats, shelves of books, and over half a century of memories.

"We never had much," she said. "A pair of shoes, some books, or maybe a dress—we only got one or two gifts." Presents were given only within the family, she said.

The scope of Christmas gift-giving these days, she theorized, is simply the result of higher incomes for most families.

"I guess you'd say Christmas is inflated," she said. "Child,en today have so many more new, breakable and expensive things."

Pulling her sheepskin vest closer around her, and readjusting her gold spectacles, she spoke about the traditional family Christmas tree. Behind closed doors, her father would stand the tree in a pail of sand, and dress it with the clip-on candle sticks.

"My father was more of a book-loving individual, and he had some difficulty setting the tree up," she recalled, smiling. When the tree was up, it would be leaning out of its bucket, and there would be strings all across the room; to the side door, to the mantel, to the china cabinet.

The children got a filled stocking tied to the bottom of their beds in the morning, but were not allowed to see the rest of the presents, until after breakfast. Only then, and after the candles on the tree had been lit, were the sliding doors to the living room opened.

"The live candles on the tree were so exciting," she said, but added, "After the first moment of 'ooohs,' it turned to 'Oh!' because little branches would start to catch fire." Someone was stationed by the tree with a pail of water to keep the tree from going up in flames.

Ornaments on the tree, she said, were much the same then as they are now. There were a few fragile glass balls, carefully packed away in the attic between Christmases, and some small decorative objects hung from wires.

"There was a lamb, and a fish," she said slowly. "There was always a star at the top of the tree, and an angel somewhere. The presents were there, and that's what really mattered!"

The family would usually have a guest for dinner, perhaps one of her father's friends, she said, but there was never any big family get-together.

"I remember one guest," she recalled, "who was entirely bald. I'd never seen anything like that at my age; I thought he was fascinating! He was very deaf, too. My mother asked if he was enjoying the holiday, and he looked out the window, and answered, 'No, I don't think it will rain today!'"

Although many find the modern way of celebrating Christmas offensive, with its materialism, and the loss of religious meaning, it doesn't really bother her, Sessions said.

"I really think everyone ought to do their own thing," she said.

DECISIONS, DECISIONS. Finding that perfect gift is the perennial problem, and with the many shops in the area and a wide selection of goods to choose from, the choice becomes even more difficult. (Staff photo by Jim Mahoney)

The issues change, but UMass remains same

By CHRISTOPHER H. SCHMITT
Collegian Staff

As UMass students leave the decade of the '70's and enter the '80's, they'll find a number of things different from ten years ago but a number of other items are pain fully similar.

A check back through Collegians from ten years ago reveals a different UMass faced by students as they entered the 1970's. While many others could be raised on campus tomorrow if only the names and faces were changed.

Here is a look at some of the issues then:

"Finally On Our Campus," The Collegian announced on Jan. 26, 1970, "Coed Living." What is taken for granted today was a novelty then. "UMass, that great mass of red tape, cold winds and newly constructed mud, has spawned a unique living unit, the CO ED dorm," said the Collegian. The Collegian reported that the atmosphere of moving into newly co-ed Greenhough dorm was "intoxicating," and that many were jealous of the new living arrangement. Parents of students moving into the new setup were reported as "concerned," like a mother "saying good-bye to a son going to bootcamp." Greenough, the newspaper said, was changed into "something special."

—The controversy over legalization of marijuana was as big then as it is today. On-campus the non profit, "Right-a-Wrong" organization, composed of "thinking adults," according to the Collegian, sought to inform the general public as to why the drug should be legalized. Obviously, the effort failed.

—Registration was different. It used to be that in order to make course selections and changes, everybody had to go down to Boyden gymnasium in an "arena" scheduling fashion. (Now, the bulk of registration is done more conveniently by mail). In the spring semester of 1970, the process went a lot more smoothly then it had the fall before.

—Rents were still haggling over landlord tenant relations. Though there are more students living off campus now than then, students then proposed a creation of a town committee to study the matter. Those students, and many since then, failed to secure passage of a rent control law.

—Politics were still an issue, and UMass students vocally made their views known. Hubert Humphrey, scheduled to speak Feb. 24 in the Curry Hicks Cage, was forced to cancel his speech after hecklers drove him from the stage.

—The Dining Commons took it on the chin, even back then. In early March, several hundreds were reported to be recovering from an incident of food poisoning in Southwest. Most of the students suffered from attacks of vomiting.

—The basketball team was a little better. In 1970, spurred by All American Julius Erving, the then Redmen received an invitation to play in the National Invitational basketball tournament in New York. Erving later went on to star in the pro ranks.

These are just a few glimpses back to campus at the start of the '70's. Today it's ten years later, but not a lot of things have changed.

It's different, but it's the same; in ten years, UMass students have seen a lot of new stuff, but a lot that's not very different at all.

Council asks frats for 'proper' guidelines

Following an incident at Amherst College last month in which an Amherst Fraternity pledge was tied naked to a tree outside the college president's home, the College Council has requested all Amherst College fraternity presidents to submit what they propose as proper behavior for fraternities.

College Council member Bill Cook said, "What may be funny to them (fraternities) may not be funny to the rest of the College."

The events surrounding the initiation incident and the practices of cohabitation at another Amherst College fraternity led to the Council's request of behavioral standards from the fraternity presidents.

'What may be funny to them may not be funny to the rest of the college."

The request was made in a letter to the greek presidents which said, "The council has begun a consideration of the ways in which the potential beneficial consequences may be maximized over the deleterious ones."

The council plans to release their results to the campus community.

Cook said the council is acting mostly as a "gathering body" rather than an evaluating unit.

Cook said responses from fraternity presidents might "cushion the impact of the upcoming Select Committee report because some of the items may be controversial."

"We are not arbiters of what is acceptable behavior" he said. "I want to know how my peers feel."

Chi Phi is the fraternity involved in the initiation rite that sparked this action.

'Halas' hurls backward pass

By STEVE ZACK
Collegian Staff
Halas by Halas
By George Halas

As snow begins to cover the New England countryside and professional football moves into the final week prior to the playoffs-which to the dismay of Patriot's fans does not include their beloved team-a new book has hit the market aimed at the fancier of pass patterns and Mad Bolzes.

Halas by Halas, (McGraw-Hill, $12.95) a biography by Chicago Bears owner George Halas reviews the life-history of the 84-year-old gentleman from his infancy through his early days of football (played without face guards which is why he looks the way he does), to his present day as mentor of the Bears.

It is a story told in a less than hard-hitting vein, instead touching on many of Halas' personal relationships, such as the courtship of his late wife, Min, and his lasting friendship with former Bear quarterback Sid Luckman, the man who represented Halas on CBS with Brent, Irv, and Jayne due to Halas' inability to go to Detroit.

Halas By Halas could best be described as a rags-to-riches story, with its biggest defect being that it is written on a third grade level, or for the person who had his head piledriven into the ground while imitating the NFL on a field outside of Brittany Manor.

There have been many great sports books written: Instant Replay, Ball Four, Bend the Drum Slowly, and (believe it or not) Cosell. Halas by Halas is not one of them.

King looks to technology for state economic support

BOSTON (AP) — Gov. Edward J. King's administration is looking to high technology industry to bolster the state's economy with more than 100,000 new jobs in the next few years.

The link between tax benefits and a booming technology can hinge on the inherent mobility of the industry. Its spokesmen claim it has the option to develop where it chooses, and there is a natural inclination toward livable states that appeal taxwise to its work force, especially its senior staffers.

King wants it to grow in Massachusetts. Early in his term, he signed a compact with the industry to do everything possible to improve the state's business climate, primarily by reducing the tax burden.

This has been a slow process, and, while the governor can point to a $40 million to $50 million cut in property taxes, the total is far short of his goal.

With continuing inflation, aggravated by ever increasing energy costs, the prospect of massive tax relief — in the order of the governor's $500 million campaign tax cut — is no longer discussed publicly.

Faced, as were governors before him, with demands for pay raises and expanded programs, King has all he can do to hold the line on the state budget. This is not encouraging news to mayors and selectmen for, without a regular boost in aid from the state, cities and towns will be hard pressed to control property rates.

A study released last week by Technical Marketing Associates of Concord supports the administration's view that economic health is contingent on new jobs in the private, and not the public, sector.

The $52,500 report was initiated at the end of former Gov. Michael S. Dukakis' term and implemented under George S. Karoteis, King's secretary of economic affairs.

Radioactive gas escapes Conn. nuke

HADDAM, Conn. (AP) — A technical malfunction at the Connecticut Yankee nuclear power plant early yesterday resulted in the release of radioactive gas at a level 40 percent above federal limits, Northeast Utilities said.

According to Robert Winkler, a spokesman for NU, the incident, which occurred at 5:48 a.m., lasted for about 45 minutes. There were no injuries reported.

Winkler said the plant's degasifier, a unit that removes gas from the reactor water, underwent "level control problems causing gas pressure to increase inside the unit."

Winkler said as a result of the accident, between 200 and 300 gallons of radioactive water were released into the base of the power plant's stack.

Winkler stressed that the major radioactive components of the gas have a half-life of about 2½ hours. A half-life is the amount of time it takes for the level of radiation given off to drop by one half.

"For all practical purposes the radioactivity is gone," he said early Sunday evening.

"The plant is still operating. There was no shutdown," Winkler said, adding, "There were no off-site consequences to the public.

Unions faulted for transit trouble

BOSTON (AP) — The crisis that threatens to shut down the Massachusetts Bay Transportation Authority results from the powerful influence of labor unions on the transit system, according to The Boston Sunday Globe.

The newspaper's "Spotlight" report concluded that "union domination of management is a major reason why the MBTA, make for exile, is the most costly and least efficient major transit system in the United States."

The Globe report said the MBTA's cost per mile of operation last year was $6.22, nearly double the $3.39 of the second most expensive system in San Francisco.

The newspaper said an alliance between the unions and the State House has undercut management efforts to upgrade labor productivity.

It quoted one high-ranking official of the Carmen's Union as saying that such problems as insubordination, laziness, harassment of foremen, leaving early and resistance to improvement in work methods are present among workers repairing the system's new, trouble-plagued trolleys. The repairmen are members of the Carmen's Union.

President George Adams of the Carmen's Union and President Joseph E. Nevins of the Machinists' Union denied that their members' working habits were the cause of the transit system's problems.

Among The Globe's findings:

—The MBTA has allowed unions to determine work habits and efficiency standards.

A luminous tree glows over the valley

Jack Gallagher

Definitely beyond the pale.
"What is that thing hanging up there?"
"It is beyond the pale."

And above description, and drivers of cars, and farmers on tractors, and walkers. And students—definitely above students. Above them all.

Watches over, guides. All-knowing ignorance. White-tipped bliss, too. More than seasonal, on top of Mt. Sugarloaf. But removed—on the other side of the river. Muted music incomprehensible. Made for deaf ears.

"But God is dead."
"Call it arbor-day, then."

Eerily suspended. Beacon caroling in the wind. Careening toward Nirvana lost. Pleading toward the sky. Yearning toward the pale. Beyond.

The season to be. The season. To cease all.

"Remember, in youth?"

"The tree?"
"The tree."
"Yes. The Tree."

Capitalizing on that. To the tea. Presenting capitalizing. Very nice. Thank you.

"That is not what I meant at all."
"Oh, oh. So much pleasure."
"Pleasure."

"Hedonism."
"No, that is not it."

VERY HIGH CEILING NEEDED. PRUNING SHEARS EXTRA. CALL OR WRITE TO: TREE, MT. SUGARLOAF.

Not in the Yellow Pages. Free for all who get there (in time). Moneybackguarantee.

A free-for-all tree for all. Slices, dices, does everything—and more.

Couldn't we...cut a hole in the roof? That would do it, wouldn't it? It would be very easy, I think. It would be...nice—quaint.

Then: Beyond the pale, at home. Then: Mountain climbing in the living room. Then: Personal, celestial harmony. Then: The season.

"I think it can...be done. Yes, I do. A new dialectic is needed.
"In short, the Gestalt is now."
"But God is dead."
"Very well, then. I contradict myself."

What is needed is, a tree for all seasons.

Editorial/Opinion

Cerebral hemorrhage

Jim Moran

The end of the year brings with it a period of reflection for many, and those who dwell in the mansions of the Fourth Estate are no exception. Permit this columnist to explore the hemispheres of his cerebral anatomy in some nostalgic recollections, with the hopes that it will bring about some revelent perspective.

September 20 saw an endorsement by me of Senator Edward Kennedy for the office of President of the United States. My column carried a prediction that the Senator would announce before Thanksgiving, probably in early November, and that a Southerner would be his running mate for Vice-President. So far, one has come to pass, with Kennedy announcing on November 7. I also expounded upon the Senator's ideological differences with President Jimmy Carter on both the domestic and foreign fronts. Subsequently, we have seen candidate Kennedy's differences on the issue of the exiled Shah's status as a human rights violator.

The issue of free speech was brought to the fore in my September 26 column, when I advocated all points of view must be allowed on this campus. On the evening of September 30, when Jane Fonda and Tom Hayden spoke at the Curry Hicks Cage, John Birchers and right-wing veterans demonstrated in opposition to their appearances, thus illustrating my point that there are prevalent forces willing to sacrifice the basic tenets of our Constitution, even under the guise of American patriotism.

The columns I authored on October 15 and on October 22 were a two-part series on Law and Order, with the former column bringing out the issue of law enforcement officers' infringement upon civil liberties. This column included an explanation of last July's Supreme Court ruling that policemen may not ask citizens to produce identification without showing "probable cause," as it would violate our Fourth Amendment rights of search and seizure. Only a few weeks later, we saw citizens' privacy invaded with the actions of SWAT teams on the UMass campus.

The problem of racism has dominated our culture for so long, and in my October 29 commentary, I chose to write about those who use racist tactics to fight racism. I discussed the current Third World attitude which utilizes anti-Jewish philosophy as a means of combating "imperialism," and I wrote of the current Iranian regime's human rights violations against women, homosexuals and other dissidents who opposed the Islamic rule in Tehran. Six days later, the United States Embassy was seized by students working for the Ayatollah Khomeini government.

The month of November saw commentaries on the gay rights march in Washington, on November 5, and on the Iranian crisis, November 12, and the intense reactions of American nationalism. The latter column warned of United States citizens expressing racist, anti-Iranian sentiment, so as to avoid appearances of hypocrisy in conflict with our First Amendment. In the ongoing dispute, we have seen such sentiment expressed, to the point of our government deporting Iranian students, and proving our double-standard approaches toward political dissidents.

November 26 was a different approach to editorializing for this writer. I attempted to produce my first "humor piece," a la Buchwald, and the response was mixed. The mainstream of the UMass campus got my points, and agreed with them. I might add, on the oversensitivity of public attitude in this academic community. The column attempted to show the hypocrisy of those involved with all the diverse "causes" in the Five-College area. No where was such a point more clearly demonstrated as with last weeks "all-female" press conference by feminist songwriter Holly Near.

December 3, I finally submitted to doing a nukes column, which wasn't really all that unrealistic for any human being who wants to survive. And last week, I wrote a column urging the passage of an amendment to the Distinguished Visitors Program bylaws, which would allow them to charge additional fees for financially demanding speakers in an attempt to broaden the spectrum of lecturers offered. The Student Senate passed the amendment.

All in all, not a bad record of prophecy, and not a weekly column which was out of touch with the times.

One thing I learned from my contribution to this newspaper's Editorial/Opinion pages is that most persons only support freedom of the press when it benefits their own interests. Another thing I learned is that for all the causes which are advocated in our society, the cause which journalists strive for is the most important—for defending the right of freedom of expression for all persons insures that all causes will exist.

SGA treasurer denounces gov't 'push' Collegian

To the Editor

Recently there has been heated discussion in both Collegian Board of Editor's meetings and Presidents Council meetings about the amount of coverage that the various components of the Student Government Association have received in the past from the Collegian.

As the issue stands, representatives of the SGA and other groups feel the quantity of reporting on SGA issues is inadequate.

Although I feel as an individual that student issues (not necessarily student government issues) should be the highest priority of the Collegian, I cannot support any push by the SGA toward greater coverage.

This "push" could take many forms from subtle persuasion to outright demands. This in itself is not serious groups probably demand coverage all the time. What is serious is that one of the segments of the SGA—the student senate controls the Collegian's budget. Even though none of my present colleagues would resort to such tactics, the threat of a budget cut in future administrations will still be there.

I strongly urge that the SGA should exercise no editorial control in any way, shape, or form over the Collegian. The Collegian is an autonomous body, made of students who are capable of making their own decisions. They determine what is newsworthy, not us. For any of my peers to demand coverage is to attack the fundamental notion of freedom of the press, especially when those demands can be backed up by political pressure.

Therefore, I ask all my colleagues to look closely at their demands. Sure, I would like to see the issues I work with to be covered extensively, but I realize the consequences would be much deeper than my own petty concerns.

Collegian loses 'iota' of remaining respect

To the Editor:

It utterly escapes me how a newspaper such as the Collegian can maintain an iota of respect at the same time it continues to print the columns of Mr. James Lewis. The contributions of Mr. Lewis are consistently vaguely researched, poorly argued, and totally devoid of wit and imagination. The sad but inevitable conclusion that the concerned reader must reach is that the Collegian only through fear of racial recrimination continues to print Mr. Lewis' diatribes. If this is the case, surely the newspaper could hire a more competent member of the Black-Third World community. If it is not the case, then the Collegian cannot expect to receive the respect of thoughtful members of the UMass community as a whole.

'The God Complex' poor reflection on Collegian

To the Editor:

While making one of my infrequent glances through the Editorial Section of Wednesday's Collegian, my attention was drawn by the editorial entitled "The God Complex."

Upon reading the article in its entirety, I was immediately saddened at having been reminded by this piece, why my reading of the Collegian Editorial page had become so infrequent. The reason is simply explained, by the shockingly deficient caliber of the Editorial Staff is being illustrated for Collegian readers with what has become alarming regularity.

Mr. Lewis' article serves as a perfect case in point. Leaving aside the political and social views expressed in his piece, which I might add amount to something of a travesty, Mr. Lewis, a contributing editorialist and Collegian columnist, cannot write.

Not only does Mr. Lewis violate the basic rules of coherent paragraph construction, as can be seen in his fifth paragraph making reference to the United States' unprecedented Military-Industrial Complex, but his entire incoherent paragraphs each of which stray further from support of his proposition.

Even the basic rule of using accurate facts as evidence is violated by Mr. Lewis when he states that 200,000 people were killed within the first minute in the Atomic Blast at Hiroshima. In fact, it has been approximated that 90,000 people were killed in the first minute and an additional 70,000 killed by the ensuing radiational effects.

But the issue of concern is not the quality of Mr Lewis' composition. It is, in fact, the caliber of the entire staff and especially the competence of the Editor-in-Chief who presumably must assume ultimate responsibility for all compositions appearing under the Collegian name.

It is indeed a sad reflection upon our University when the daily newspaper cannot offer a more intellectually rewarding editorial opinion that that which has been provided in the form of Mr. Lewis' "The God Complex."

Reply to Collegian, Nummo anti-Semitism

To the Editor:

This letter is a reply to two opinions concerning anti-Semitism recently printed in the Collegian and the Nummo News. Excuse me if my letter is not a journalistic masterpiece, you see, I know little about journalism. On the other hand, I do know anti-Semitism!

According to Webster's Seventh New Collegiate Dictionary, an anti-Semite is "one who is hostile to, or discriminates against Jews." Nowhere in the definition is there mention of Arabic or any other people than Jews. It has been asked "where is the anti-Semitism in our community?" As a Jew that has felt it—let me enlighten you.

Anti-Semitism does not need to be as extreme as the extermination of millions of Jews, it can be much closer to home. It can be the words "JEW-BOY" carved in a dormroom door. It can be the verbal assaults during the high holy day services. It can be informal joking about how cheap that "kike" is. It can be out of ignorance, when someone wishes you a "Merry Jewish Christmas." It can be not allowing an academic demand be met because a religiental or even program status (such as Judaic Studies).

Some have asked for proof. Well, it is necessary for a lynching to occur for us to have proof of Black racism? No it is not! Nor is it necessary for an intimidated or discriminated Jew to put on display his or her emotional or physical scars of anti-Semitism. When asked, "Where are the reports to the law?"—my reply is simple. No police department records the number of anti-Semitic assaults in any given year. But that is not to negate the problem. Each year the police statistics concerning rape are lower than the actual number, but that does not mean that more rapes do not occur or that it is not a problem. Further, simply because there are no records regarding anti-Semitic actions does not signify that it is not occuring.

Find out for yourself (if you can). Just ask a friend that is Jewish and willing to discuss it openly and you will see that there are these feelings of fear, and that Jews do feel oppressed and intimidated. But remember—if you are not Jewish and ask this of a Jew, he or she may not be willing to discuss their true feelings.

Pro-nukers, no-nukers resort to simplicity

To the Editor

Pro-nukers and no-nukers are both notorious for simplifying the nuclear issue. Pro-nukers are trying to ram nuclear power down our throats, irregardless of the fact that it is being grossly mismanaged by the nuclear industry. No-nukers would have us abandon it completely, at the expenses of industry.

Jim Moran, in an article called "Einstein Could Relate To The Nuclear Issue" suggested the latter course and said that any sane man would be against nuclear power. Like most no-nukers he offered many alternatives to nuclear power, the only problem being that these are insufficient to keep the industry rolling along. If Jim Moran thinks we can get along without industries then he's the one who's crazy. He did mention one source, coal, that would provide sufficient power to run our industries, but it can't be burned cleanly, which was one of his objections to nuclear power.

The truth is we are going to need nuclear power and it can be clean and safe.

We can shoot waste into space or develop breeder reactors that recycle waste. The biggest danger is posed by the brokers of nuclear power, whose only concern is profit. Until the nuclear industry is totally revamped, I think nuclear power should be banned like taking a dangerous toy from a baby!. Certain plants should be shut, down, permanently, such as Seabrook, because of possible environmental damage, and the plants constructed on earthquake zones. One of the biggest obstacles to this plan is the business community, which sort of runs things around here in case you hadn't noticed. The baby is a big one.

Even a temporary ban on nuclear power would require great hardships; 13 percent of the nation's electricity comes from nuclear power. This figure is often cited by no-nukers to prove that our reliance on nuclear power is minimal, but that is a bunch of crap; 13 percent of the total amount of energy consumed by the U.S. is a LOT of energy. Another fact conveniently left out is the distribution of that energy. New England, for example, gets 60 percent of its electricity from nuclear plants.

The best solution to the energy crisis is the development of fusion reactors. These reactors produce almost no waste and could use water for fuel. They would extract from one gallon of water the amount of energy we now get out of 300 gallons of gas.

The beauty about water is that no one can corner the market on it.

Student praises Kennedy workers; 'hell of a time'

To the Editor

Concerning the recent derogatory articles toward Senator Kennedy, I wish to relate my experience in the Kennedy campaign. My first contact was through the Kennedy table which was set up in the Student Union. It was at that time that I was introduced to Irwin Schwartz, a Kennedy worker. Mr. Schwartz welcomed me in a warm and friendly manner, which heightened my enthusiasm about further involvement. On Saturday, December 8, a group of UMass students went to New Hampshire for the weekend to campaign for the Senator.

After a hard days work of canvassing we spent the evening partying and meeting other Kennedy workers which included Sydney Lawford and Caroline Kennedy.

We returned to UMass on Sunday. I met alot of nice people, learned a great deal about campaigning, and, overall, had one hell of a time.

I would like to encourage any UMass students who would like to get involved to contact the campaign of their choice over intersession. It not only offers a great learning experience, but also is alot of fun.

Bagli falsely blames visible organizers: 'Absurd'

To the Editor

Charli Bagli,[illegible] in article called "Packing Them In," placed the blame for the 11 deaths at the Cincinnati Coliseum on the general admission policy and said that he would like to see the promoter and the Coliseum owners arrested for murder.

I think this viewpoint is totally absurd. Those deaths were caused by the kids who stampeded the doors and no one else. Granted, the stampeding wouldn't have occurred if there had been assigned seating, but it also wouldn't have occurred if a group of mature people were waiting to attend a general admission concert. The true murderers were the kids who scrambled for the doors as though their lives depended on getting there first.

The only reason parents of the casualties named the Who, the promoters and the Coliseum owners in a suit is because they are the most visible and available targets on which to vent their anger and frustration.

time all semester. Linda Tillery, World Saxophone Quartet, Now You See It, Wish You'd Seen It Last Semester finishes the list.

After a lot of ruckus last semester regarding Governor Edward J. King, nobody gave him much thought this fall. In November, though, King wrote a letter which was printed in the Collegian.In it he stated the University should be conservatively budgeted. Next, King began blocking numerous efforts by the Boston Globe to release his financial expenditures under the Freedom of Information Act. When some of it was finally released, the Globe revealed King spends a lot of tax dollars on lobster and crabmeat lunches.

Even though there are still problems with the buildings, campus landscaping might improve. This semester new plans were drawn.

Campus fraternities were unhappy when the Collegian revealed after-hours bars there.

New Chancellor Henry Koffler became alarmed after Halloween and decided that vandalism and anti-semitism were the biggest problems on campus. He appointed a committe to decide what to do about it.

The Russell's incident caused racist tension when three local black women were charged with disorderly conduct.

The UMass women's field hockey team finished fourth in the nation.

The Minutemen gridders lost. The UMass basketball team lost for the nineteenth year in a row.

Because of the increase in vandalism,dormitory residents are now required to show their keys to security before going to their rooms. Guests must sign. Campus police were called "SWAT" teams after reportedly snooping on dormmies.

Some UMies did a good thing, too. They sacrificed a meal for one day last month and donated money to hungry people in Cambodia.

Students supposedly learned last semester. We learned, too. We learned that it's hard to sum up a semester on deadline.

News highlights this semester included a protest in Amherst against Third World repression, top, and a speech on campus by Jane Fonda, bottom. (Collegian file photos).

Nuke platforms questioned

MassPIRG is beginning a program to force presidential candidates to take clear positions on nuclear power—a campaign which will provide about 50 internships from January through March, a spokesman for the group said.

John Pepi said interested persons should apply before January 1, 1980 at the Amherst town office for positions that will take students throughout Massachusetts and New Hampshire.

He said some stipends will be given and rooms and travel expenses paid if interns travel to a city where a candidate will be speaking.

★ Iran

revolutionary leader Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini had decided on an international jury. "I don't believe anyone can resist that, including the students," he said.

Previously, Ghotbzadeh had been overruled by students when he promised an early release of U.S. Charge d'Affaires L. Bruce Laingen and two other senior American diplomats detained at the Foreign Ministry.

He also was flatly contradicted by students last week when he expressed hope that diplomats "not consciously involved in spying" would be freed soon.

Observers believe, however, that when it comes to a trial date — Iran's trump card against the United States — the revolutionary leaders will make the decision.

A government radio commentary earlier in the day said, "By expelling the shah the U.S.A. accepted a part of what Iran insisted upon.... America's military intervention in Iran was a bluff."

The ruling council's statement also attacked Panama, saying, "By giving sanctuary to this great criminal, the Panamanian government has become an accomplice in America's crime. It must deliver him to Iran's Revolutionary Court as soon as possible."

In the first hint of revenge against Panama — which has no diplomatic mission here — the Tehran newspaper Ettelaat, quoting informed sources in the Oil Ministry, said they would check whether Panama was an oil customer and, if so, cut off supplies. But Panamanian officials later said their country had not received Iranian oil since 1973.

Meanwhile, student militants took over the Iran-America Society in Tehran and said they were searching for documents that might link it to the embassy, which has been called a "spy nest."

At the center, formerly funded jointly by the U.S. and Iranian governments, one the five foreign teachers said militant students arrived Saturday night and "took over everything," but no hostages were seized.

Iran had boycotted the International Court hearing in The Hague, Netherlands, and said previously it would ignore the verdict.

But the court's finding may add weight to any U.S. appeal to the U.N. Security Council to impose economic and other sanctions against Iran.

Students also felt study areas on campus this semester were inadequate.

"I really appreciate the library opening because it's easier to study here," said Joanne Tuquette, a sophomore industrial engineering major studying last night in a carrel on the 17th floor. "It's much quieter than the Physical Science Library or the Grad Research Tower."

"This place is a lot better," said one student. "Goodell was too hot, the lighting was poor and it was very noisy."

One very noticeable change in the tower is the freshly painted stairwells, which in the past were a topic of conversation because of graffiti on the walls.

"I couldn't stand the graffiti on the stairwells," said Levin. "I'm glad they painted it."

Another assault and battery was reported in the Central Residentail Area, outside the Franklin Dining Commons. A student was jumped and beaten up by three people, Dumas said. The case is under investigation by police who currently have no suspects.

An Auburn man was also arrested in Dickinson Dormitory in the Orchard Hill Residential Area on charges of disturbing the peace for harassing a student in a dormitory.

Brian C. Davis, 27, of Auburn was arrested Saturday morning shortly before 9.

Swimmen and swimwomen collect victories

By SCOTT SOLOMON
Collegian Staff

UMass swimming Coach Russ Yarworth had only a little to say after his team beat Springfield, 58-15, Thursday, to give the rookie commander his first big league victory.

"It's sweet," he said, moving across the length of the pool to congratulate the Minutemen. "It's so sweet."

For UMass, the meet marked the first time that they have had recognizable competition. Without question, the Minutemen did not have the caliber of swimmer to go up against a squad such as Tufts or B.U., and each of their previous meets resulted in sizeable losses. Against the Chiefs, UMass was able show the potential and quality which had been muffled earlier.

The Minutemen fought off several nasty Springfield surg: during the meet, and captured eight first place spots, including two by diver Dan Anthony.

For the first time this season, UMass took the lead at the opening gun, with a 3:50.15 time in the 400 meter medley relay, which teamed John Muluaney, Dave Stevens, Eli Bowers, and Tom Dundon.

In the 200 yard free, Dundon blazed through the eight lap trail and scored a mark of 1:48.5, four seconds ahead of Springfield's Rick Parker. Dundon's victory kept the Minutemen on top, 16-9.

Steve Samuel followed Dundon's performance with some pizzazz of his own, as he toppled the pack with a wham-bam victory in the 50-yard free, scoring a time of 23.03. Brian Spellman, who is swimming unofficially in his first year with the Minutemen because of ineligibility, was the actual first place finisher, clocked at 22.66. Only the second place finish by Bowers in the 200-yard individual medley cut the UMass lead to 24-19, and set the stage for the afternoon heroics.

Enter Monsieur Anthony, and a bit of diving magic that was well worth the wait.

In the fourth round of one-meter competition, Anthony performed a back, 1½ somersault dive in pike position, and recieved scores of 6.7, and 7½. In the sixth stanza the Waltham native executed a front, 1½ somersault leap in free position with one twist. This time he was greeted with 7½, 7½, and 8. At the completion of the event Anthony tallied 239.6 points, 10 in front of teammate Mark Vernaglia, and 48 ahead of the Chief's Mike Prutz. Following the diving, Minutemen Bowers and Muluaney captured wins in the 200-yard fly and 200-yard backstroke respectively, giving UMass a 46-33 lead.

In the three-meter diving, it was Anthony again, as he scored a 261.6 mark, shattering Jim Antonio's old record (244.95) set last year. Anthony's triumph stretched the UMass lead from six (47-41), to nine, at 53-44.

In the 200-meter breaststroke, the final individual event of the competition, Dave Stevens insured the win with a first place finish in 2:23.8. Although the Chiefs took the second and third slots, the Minutemen held the edge, 58-48.

The finale, the 400 yard freestyle relay, featured Steve Samuel, John Sleeman, Mike Boucher, and Tom Dundon. Samuel opened at a strong pace and kept the lead for the on-deck swimmer Sleeman. The junior co-captain finished just ahead of Springfield's Steve Steele, paving the way for Boucher. It was here that UMass ran into trouble, as Boucher fell behind at the 75-yard mark of his spot. Dundon had no real chance to regain the lead, and the Minutemen dropped the race but retained the match, 58-55.

Seven different swimmers captured winning spots, while Anthony accounted for both board victories. What UMass is seemingly lacking, however, is a powerful number two man, someone that will consistently be right behind the victor. The Minutemen walked away with only four second place and four third place finishes in the meet, accounting for 16 points, while Springfield accounted for 31 points in this category.

The next meet for the Minutemen will take place on February 2 against U.R.I. at 2:00 p.m. in Rhode Island.

The UMass women's swim team crushed Clark University 87-42. This raises their record to 5 wins, 3 losses.

UMass came out strong and held on to a substantial lead throughout the meet. Most of the Clark swimmers were out sick, as was some of the UMass squad.

The 400 yard medley relay team of Kathy Jurcik, Theresa Totin, Celia Walsh, and Judy Miller, captured first place. In the longest event of the meet, the 1000 yd. freestyle, Caroline Benjamin and Judy Goffi finished one-two. Leslie Johnson and Judy Miller also placed one-two in the 200 yd. freestyle.

In the 100 yd. backstroke Nancee Shifflett finished first with Judy Goffi finishing in the third place spot. Theresa Totin and Nancy Collins gave UMass yet another one-two finish in the 100 yd. breastroke.

UMass divers Kathy Driscoll, Denise Tetro, and Jean Bushee swept the require diving event. In the optionals, Driscoll placed first with Bushee in second and Tetro finishing third.

Jennifer Black and Jeanne Kelly gave UMass a one-three finish in the 100 yd. freestyle, and in the 50 free, Kelly finished second with Joan Spierdowis finishing third.

Again the combination of Benjamin and Goffi stacked up points as they finished two-three in the 200 yd. backstroke. Theresa Totin captured another first place in the 200 yd. individual medley, with Judy Miller finishing third. Swimmer-coach Celia Walsh placed second in the 100 yd. butterfly with Cindy Piela placing third. Nancy Collins captured another first place for UMass, doing her best time in the 200 yd. breastroke. Clark won the 400 yd. freestyle relay but by then UMass had the meet neatly wrapped up.

UMass should have won this game. Both coaches and players know it. The team has a problem and coach Ray Wilson knows what it is.

"You have some guys who want to win and know how to win," the coach said. "They've forgotten the feeling of winning and therefore don't know the price you have to pay to attain it."

UMass faces American International College tonight at 7:00 at Curry Hicks Cage.

Gymnasts lose

By JAY BRIGHTMAN
Collegian Staff

Saturday, at Curry Hicks Cage, the UMass women's gymnastic team put up a tough fight against nationally ranked Penn State but came out on the short-end as Penn State defeated UMass by the score, 136-131.

"I have a younger competitive team and in the Regional finals they should be more competitive when we go up against Penn State again," said UMass Coach Virginia Evans.

Penn State, who came into the meet ranked #2 nationally, got more than they bargained for from the younger UMass gymnasts. Penn State, who has a more experienced team, attempted more tricks but were unable to complete many of those tricks successfully, and at the end of two events Penn State had a slim two point advantage.

UMass had difficulty on the balance beam with their top scorer receiving only a 7.95. After completing their beam routines, UMass was trailing by four points and the outcome was inevitable.

Lisa Martin had a very solid performance, finishing second with a score of 33.75 in the all-around for the second time in two meets. Lisa Ingebretsen of Penn State won all-around with a total of 34 points. Both UMass and Penn State came up with scores of 8.9 and 9.0. Marcy Levine of Penn State came up with scores of 9.05 and 9.15 which were the top scores of the meet.

"We have to perfect our basic moves before we start working on harder tricks," explained UMass gymnast Liz Marino. "During intersession we will be attempting harder tricks in preparation for the upcoming meets." Two years ago Liz was in the qualifying trials of the World Games.

Presently, UMass has a 2-2 record and will put that record on the line when they go against Rutgers on January 18th.

Trackmen wind up decade with loss to URI, UNH

By JANE WOLFSON
Collegian Staff

Ten years ago, to begin the decade, the UMass men's indoor track team were defeated by the University Connecticut 58-51, so it seemed almost appropriate that they should lose their last meet of the 70's as well, which they did to the University of Rhode Island and the University of New Hampshire by scores of URI 88, UNH 41 and UMass 40.

The Minutemen did not carry high aspirations of defeating Rhode Island which Coach Ken O'Brien referred to as being an extremely well balanced team, but had hoped to beat New Hampshire.

UMass's three first place finishes came in the 60 yard dash and in the one and two mile relays.

Sophomore Bill DeVarney won the dash with a time of 6.5. DeVarney along with junior tri-captain Rick Trunfio, Rick Cady and Bob Pearson ran 3.31 to take the mile relay, three seconds ahead of UNH.

The relay team of seniors Rick Walls, Bob Martin, tri-captain Steve MacDougall and freshman John Marr won the two mile relay at 8:05.9, a blistering seven seconds ahead of UNH.

In the distance events sophomore Chris Omelitchenko placed third in the two mile run with a time of 9:19.1. New Hampshire's John Stearns won the event at 9:14.1. MacDougall and Walls placed second and third in the mile run as well.

In the middle distance events, senior Jerry Pratt took third in the 1000 yard run, at a 2:18.7 clip. Freshman Tom Lawrence had an impressive showing in the 880 as he finished fourth, at 2:01.4. In the 600 Pearson took third, with a time of 1:15.4 and in the 440 Trunfio finished second by one tenth of a second at 51.9 to URI's Mike Roberts 51.8; Rick Cady finished fourth with 52.4.

UMase got shut out of the triple jump, the high jump, and the 35 pound weight as none of the Minutemen were able to place in those events.

UMass pole vaulter Jim Larabee finished fourth clearing fourteen ft., three inches short of the school record.

Junior Paul King placed third in both the long jump and 60 yard hurdles. Ed Iwanowicz placed fourth in the hurdles and DeVarney placed fourth in the long jump.

Freshman shot putter Stephen Hyder, with a throw of 47'6.5 inches clinched the third spot for the Minutemen.

NEW BRITIAN, CONN. - Senior Sue Peters exploded for 24 points in the second half here Saturday night to spark the UMass women's basketball team past Central Connecticut, 90-82.

Peters, who had been averaging 14.2 points per game, regained her shooting touch in the second half, hitting on eight for 13 from the floor while directing a wide open running offense. She was also perfect at the foul line in ten attempts to total a game high against the Blue Devils (3-2).

"We told her (Peters) that if she had the opportunity to do something with the ball to do it," said assistant coach Steve Jefferson. The Southbridge native also combined for center Julie Ready for 27 rebounds.

Led by 5'11" Donna Fiedorowicz (30 points) and forward Irene Pierce (24) Central Connecticut broke on top of UMass 8-4 five minutes into the game. The Minutewomen took a lead they would never relinquish when two jump shots by Valerie DePaolo (again a starter) along with a breakaway steal by Peters and a basket by Ginger Legare put UMass up 12-8 at 6:20.

Legare hit on two lay-ups and a free throw to put UMass up by seven at 20-13, but the Blue Devils came back, showing the shooting talent that would plague the UMass defense the rest of the night. Central scored six straight points with baskets by Beth Polick, Pierce and the incredibly agile Fiedorowicz who sank a 15-footer to close the gap to 22-21.

Central then went into a full-court press that gave the Minutewomen considerable trouble in bringing the ball upcourt; but since there is no 10-second violation in women's basketball, Central's efforts only produced a foul on freshman Depaolo who hit two free throws to give UMass another seven point margin at 30-23 at 6:43.

Freshman Sue Carey netted all eight of her points late in the first half to help increase the Minutewomen lead at halftime to 44-24.

At the start of the second half UMass came out running on the Blue Devils, an aspect of the Minutewomen game not employed fully by coach Mary Ann Ozdarski's squad this season.

Ready hit a 10-footer at 19:30 to keep the lead at ten, but Central brought on the guns of Fiedorowicz (18 second half points) who netted eight points with three field goals and a pair of free throws to help outscore UMass 14-8 in a five minute stretch to bring the Blue Devils within two at 15:30, 52-50.

"We ran tonight but forgot a little bit about defense," Ozdarski said. "But they can shoot the eyes out of the basket, how can you defend against that?"

The stabilizing force of sophomore Sherry Collins was again evident against Central as it was against Rhode Island. Collins, who has not started the last two games in lieu of freshman Val Depaolo, seemed more suited to the role of third guard, scoring nine second half points while forming the running offense with Peters.

Collins hit an eight-foot jumper at 8:10 of the second half to keep the UMass lead at six, 66-60 and help to hold off the Blue Devils.

A pair of unfortunate circumstances for UMass kept Central in the ballgame, however. The first was three straight turnovers and Devil baskets by Pierce, Anna Dipierro and a lay-up by Rita Lupacchino to close the score to 72-68.

The second was the fifth foul on Ginger Legare (nine points) at 5:56. The 6'1" forward picked up three first half fouls and was out on an offensive call by the officials. The Blue Devils closed the lead to just two points when Pierce hit a 17-foot bomber to make the score 72-70 at 5:56. It was as close as Central would come to the Minutewomen.

The rest of the game was largely a display of the talents of Peters and Collins. Collins made the score 76-70 with a steal and a lay-up. Peters upped the lead to ten at 4:20 with a lay-up on a pass from Ready.

Peters scored nine points in the last minute of play including a pretty three point play and both ends of a one-and-one situation to close out the scoring for the Minutewomen, 90-82.

UMASS (90) - Ready 10-2-22 (4 rebounds), Collins 4-3-11, Peters 11-10-32, Corcoran 0-0-0, Depaolo 1-2-4, Heinzmann 1-0-2, Carey 3-2-8, Legare 4-1-9, Parker 1-0-2 Totals: 35-20-90.

Halftime advantage disappears, 82-76

By DAVE BRADLEY
Collegian Staff

Hopes that a 37-35 halftime edge would lead to the men's basketball team's first win Saturday were quickly vanquished as the Crimson Tide took advantage of a second half parade to the foul line for an 82-76 victory at Harvard.

Nobody on the UMass side blamed the officials for the loss ("There is no excuse," said UMass center Jay Stewart. "We should have beat them."). But to ignore the fact that Harvard went to the "jam-me" stripe 51 times compared to UMass' 29 would be an oversight. Four Minutemen fouled out and another had four fouls before the contest ended.

Co-captain George Dennerlein felt the referees didn't "call it both ways," but said UMass should have won anyway.

"That was the first team we played that we were better than man to man," he said. "It wasn't the officials' fault." Dennerlein fouled out with 14:40 left in the second half.

Freshman forward Dan Wright looked like he was on his way to a great performance, leading all scorers with 12 points at the half, but the refs blew him out of the game 30 seconds after Dennerlein.

"They (officials) didn't give us no breaks, not that we were expectin' any," Wright said. "This is our loss."

The game itself resembled a cross between exciting basketball and a how-to-shoot-free-throws clinic. UMass opened the contest with authority, taking a 6-2 lead on two field goals by Wright and a breakaway lay-up by Curtis Phauls. This lead didn't last long, however, as Harvard scored 11 unanswered points in the next two minutes and 12 seconds to take a 13-6 lead five minutes into the game. UMass already had six team fouls at this point, Harvard one.

Wright scored another four points on two foul shots and a field goal off an inbounds play to bring the score to 15-10. Then Dennerlein picked up a loose ball at the half court and fed guard Tom Witkos for a drive down the lane, forcing Harvard to take a time-out with the score 16-12 at the 12:59 mark.

Harvard increased its lead in the next few minutes to 22-16 as the ball would not fall for the Minutemen.

Twelve minutes into the game UMass started to take control. Witkos forced a jump ball with some good defense, and won the tap, bangin' the ball ahead to the breaking Phauls for a crowd wakening slam dunk. Wright hit one foul shot the had the most attempts at the line for UMass, hitting four of nine) and Phauls hit two more to once again give the visitors the lead at 22-21.

The two teams traded baskets until the score was tied at 28. Here UMass ran off seven to take their biggest lead at 35-28, threatening to put the game out of reach.

It was not to be. With 15 seconds left in the half UMass was up 37-32 but Dennerlein sent a Crimson player to the line for two. He hit the first and missed the second. A Harvard player grabbed the rebound and sent it long to make the score 37-35 at half. It was the first time this year UMass went to the locker with a halftime lead.

Things fell apart early for UMass in the second half. Harvard took a 42-41 lead on a running right hander across the lane by guard Tom Mannix, then extended that lead to 50-44, and 56-48 a little more than five minutes into the half. When Wright fouled out, the score was 58-48, and it increased to 67-53 midway through the half.

UMass out that lead to 72-65 with 6:30 to play but Harvard regained control and time ran out.

CARTER·S CHRISTMAS CRISIS

by Tony Crayton

There is no doubt in my mind that when most students go home for the intersession they will be bombarded in discussion on Iran, human rights and the presidential elections. These are issues of concern that appear to dominate the news and coffee house discussions because there has never been such an uninterrupted crisis of this porportion since the Vietnam War era. With this in mind I want to submit some thoughts to you as you leave to ring in the new year.

Within the last four months, America has been faced with two major crisis. One was over the "Soviet combat brigade" that supposedly threatened the U.S. being only 90 miles away in Cuba. The other was the crisis in Iran. The Iran crisis is being viewed as the first time in decades that American patriotism and nationalism was nation-wide. The thing to note however is that Americans are duped again into looking at a foreign nation as an enemy.

The crisis of the Soviet Brigade and that of Iran were both "created" by the Carter Administration to bolster his image in the polls and cover over the sorry state of affairs in the country and its foreign policy as a whole. America will have found the Cristmas gift from Carter that appears to have brought the country together, is one of the nastiest political con games of the century.

On September 4th Senator Frank Church claimed that the SALT II agreement would be held up until Carter did something about the discovered presence of the Soviet Combat Brigade in Cuba. Two days later the Senate Select Committee announced hearings to determine if there was an "intelligence failure" by the United States in detecting the Soviet Brigade. The Administration tried to act as if they did not know about it and that now the SALT II talks were in severe jeopardy. The fervor was over 2,000 Soviet military personel that had been there for 17 years. The problem was Carter was down to a 24 percent approval in the polls and election time was approaching.

The brigade crisis was a vicious fabrication. As far back as July 18, 1979 Senator Stone had met with Vice-President Mondale about it. They timed the disclosure to be announced by Church for the opening day of the 6th Conference of Non-Aligned Nations in Havana Cuba with Fidel Castro as the Convenor. It was clearly designed to unsettle the conference and attempt to make it appear like Carter was being tough on a "Soviet satilite" nation.

The supposed crisis was a violent insult to the American public's intelligence.

The Carter response was a pathetic spectacle before the world. He demanded assurances from the Sovints that no unit in Cuba be used as a combat force to threaten the security of the United States or any other nation in this hemisphere." Of course he failed to mention that 2,000 American troops combat ready, were on Cuban soil at Guantanamo Bay and that 18 years ago (1 year before the Brigade was installed) the United States financed, trained and assisted in an unprovoked invasion of Cuba at the Bay of Pigs. Although the U.S. was not threatened, they viewed Castro as "a Communist menace to the U.S. and had to be ousted" (U.S. News World Report, August 13, 1979). Later C.I.A. revelations showed that they also tried to assassinate Castro twelve times! So again they threaten Cuba with a bogus claim of a combat crisis and stepped up surveillance and staged a childish mock invasion at Guantanamo Bay while the Cuban army played sports and slept.

A false crisis was percipitated for political reasons that endangered the entire world and now Iran.

The embassy take over was the result of direct agitation of the Iranian government and a flagrant disregard for their concerns over the entry of the Shah to the U.S.

One aspect of this crisis that is not projected by the media is the manner in which the Shah entered the country. The Carter Administration has used a perverse moral persuasion to convince people that this is a crisis and criticism is out of order. History, however, has shown the foolishness of falling for such bullshit. One need only project your imagination into the future and envision the coffins returning from Iran and ask, over why did my father, brother of friend die?

A State Department messenger boy named Lainger met with the Prime Minister Bazargan and U.N. representative Yazdi, in an effort to subvert the power of the "radical forces" drawing their backing from the Ayatollah Khomeini. He was accompanied by Henry Precht, the State Department's Officer for Iran and the meetings were held twice on October 21, and 22 (N.Y. Times 11-18-79). Each time the Iranians protested the American decision to allow the Shah entry into the U.S.

The Administration knew months earlier of a threat to the Embassy if the Shah was allowed in and in the beginning of the summer had reinforced the doors with more steel and added more marine guards. They also knew of the impending take over of the Embassy on November 1st and did absolutely nothing to evacuate the diplomats and personel as at other embassies. The Embassy fell to the Iranian people four days later.

Having known in advance that the takeover was eminent and having taken measures to allow the Shah in anyway, the only remaining question was the reason for his entry. The rationale was that he had a life threatening ailment and for "humanitarian reasons" allowed him in. The major Cancer Institutes like Sidney Faber in Boston and the National Cancer Institute all said that he could have been treated elsewhere or have gotten the experts to come to Mexico. If you notice the ailment that was causing him to be jaundiced was treated by a Canadian imported doctor! The Princess Margaret Hospital in Totonto Canada had the personel and the equipment for his care (Boston Globe November 24 page 1). The entire affair could have easily been avoided and now Carter is ahead of Kennedy in the polls.

To show typically how these bastards lie outright to the public they reported Friday that the Shah had a relasp. They claimed he was too ill because of a supposed enlarged spleen to attend an arraignment upon court appearance to give sworn testimony in a Bell Helecopter lawsuit. The next day, Saturday December, 15th 1979, the Shah Muhammed Riza Pahlevi was residing comfortably in an island resort in Panama as the country's guest. And Carter's points in the polls rise.

They lied to get the murderer in they lied to get the murderer out, and still "Americans are held hostage." For what? The bastards was not sick from the start. As with the Cuban Crisis over the brigade which flopped, the Iran crisis succeeded in making America look strong and Carter presidential. Carter is up 30 points; the people are down; from inflation, unemployment, lack of gas and oil, and lack of understanding as to how now beating oil, and lack of understanding as to how now are they damn near at war again.

So when your parents and friends at home talk of international law remind them that it was America that dropped two atomic bombs on a beated demoralized, indefensable population of Japanese men, women, children and babies. Remind them that it was an undeclared war in Vietnam yet at the hight of the bombing raids it had, as their Defense Secretary McNamara said, "exceded our expectations." They dropped more bombs on a country the size of Florida then all their wars put together. If they do not believe you tell them to check out the 1967 New York Times report of the targets of the bombings. Check the December 13th and 14th Times articles of Harrison Salisbury who was there to report the carnage. They bombed the Polish Friendship School, the Polish Rumanian, and Chinese embassies. They hit the Canadian mission and the Red River irrigation system, homes, churches, schools and hospitals.

They supported the attempted overthrown of the very government in Angola that protected their business interests by arming and training the degenerate Jonas Savimbi. They planned the overthrow of Patrice Lamumba and had him killed. Chile, Vietnam, Angola, Cuba the list of covert operations by the C.I.A. through the diplomatic cover of embassies is endless. They overthrow legitimate governments, assassinate their leaders, subvert their national interests and inshort allow multinational corporations to exploit, oppress and degrade millions across the globe.

Now if this upsets them say your sorry and ask if they know that Ben Chavis is out of jail. They will probably say "who?" Then ask them if they know who authorized the security stripping of Malcom X and Martin Luther King exposing them to assassination. Ask them who authorized the murder of Fred Hampton in his bed while he slept; along with Mark Clark, and who authorized the sterilization of over 30 percent of the Native Indian population. And while you think about all of this ask yourself if you can understand why the Third World is inclined to anti-American sentiments. Ask yourself why Blacks, Hispanics, Indians and Asians smile with such hidden fury; ask yourself and see why the world is so near yet so far apart.

SANDINISTAS WANT U.S. AID BUT NO STRINGS

Nicaragua's new leaders are trying to get across to North Americans the tremendous task of reconstruction they face.

And they are campaigning for US financial and moral support.

"We need it now more than we ver realized," says Jaime Wheelock Roman. The Minister of Agrarian Reform, one of the top Sandinista guerrilla leaders now running the government of the Central American country, is currently in the United States.

"This does not mean, however, that we want to be under the United States' thumb," adds the soft spoken and boyish looking Nicaraguan. "A nation invaded four times in the past century by North American soldiers is naturally wary of that possibility.

"What we are looking for is a new path to bring about understanding between interests that have walked apart. Now maybe we can walk together again, respecting each other."

His words are echoed by Victor Manuel Tirado Lopez, another top Sandinista commander who is with Mr. Wheelock on a tour of seven US cities. "What we are trying to do here in the United States is search for types of assistance that can aid in solving the immense problems we face in Nicaragua today."

Among these problems:

A nation shattered by 18 months of fierce warfare between the Sandinista guerrillas and the entrenched Somoza family dynasty. This left 50,000 dead, 150,000 injured half a million or more of Nicaragua's 2.6 million people homeless, as well as 30 percent of industry destroyed and most of agriculture paralyzed.

Unemployment running at 50 percent overall, with some urban areas registering 60 percent or more; a whopping foreign debt of 11.6 billion built up by the Somoza family, service on which could eat up the country's foreign exchange earnings each year, and projected shortages of food staples for the months ahead that can only be met by outside assistance.

The US Government's request for 175 million in aid for Nicaragua was approved by the House Foreign Affairs Committee Dec. 11. But the panel set a condition that the aid be cut off if Soviet of Cuban combat troops move into the country.

The two Sandinista leaders readily recognize the suspicion with which their movement is held in many US circles. Mr. Wheelock told a group of Boston bankers:

"We are sometimes criticized for being Marxists and, at other times, for selling out the revolution to the Capitalists. But to that, we say we are trying to find Nicaraguan solutions to our problems, no matter which direction they take us. And anyway, we want a pluralistic society and a mixed economy for Nicaragua."

The Nicaraguans are telling businessmen and bankers that a good 75 percent of the Nicaraguan economy is in private hands and will remain there.

To the critics on the Left, many of them young students in the US who argue that the Sandinistas are "selling out the Revolution," Mr. Wheelock has this answer: "They are not running the country." Actually, a good deal of the Nicaraguan economy has been nationalized in the wake of the Sandinista triumph last July.

Mr. Wheelock frequently makes the point, however, that Nicaraguans do not want, nor will they accept, aid with strings attached to it. "True economic independence," he says, "is our goal."

CUBAN GUNNED DOWN IN NEW JERSEY

On Sunday, November 25, at 9:50 am., Mr. Eulalio Negrin was gunned down in front of his house in Union City, NJ, in full view of his 12 year old son.

Mr. Negrin, 38, had been a member of the Committee of 75, a group of representatives from the Cuban community abroad, which traveled to Cuba in November and December of 1978, to negotiate the release of the Cuban political prisoners, the authorization of family and tourist visits to Cuba by Cuban exiles and the reunification of divided nuclear families.

The assasins were reportedly two men, wearing ski masks, who shot at him from a passing car, described by eyewitnesses as a 2 tone Ford Granda. Mr. Negrin was hit by five shots from a semiautomatic weapon and he died immediately.

An anonymous caller phones the press services later in the day and claimed responsibility in the name of Omega 7, threatening to kill all other "traitors."

On April 28, 1979, Carlos Muniz Varela, president of Varadero Tours, the company in charfe of the trips from the Cuban community in Puerto Rico to Cuba, was assassinated in the streets of San Juan. Omega 7 also claimed responsibility for Carlos Muniz' death, identifying him as a member of the Committee of 75 although he had not participated in the negotiations with the Cuban government.

Mr. Negrin, had been a very active member of the Cuban community in New Jersey, where he ran a community referral and service center in Weekawken until it was bombed last March, in the aftermath of the convictions of three members of the Cuban Nationalist Movement (the Novo brothers and Alvin Ross) for their participation in the assassination of Orlands Let earlier, former Chilean ambassador to Washington.

Omega 7 is widely believe to be the assassination squad of the Cuban Nationalist Movement. It had claimed responsibility for the bombing of Negrin's office, as well as the bombs in a TWA plane scheduled to leave Kennedy Airport (to Los Angeles) and a warehouse in MJ, all in protest for the Letelier convictions.

Since 1975, there have been over a dozen assassinations and assassination attempts in the Cuban community and nearly 200 other terrorist attacks including bombings, kidnapping attempts, etc., and in their almost totality they have remained without any arrests being conducted.

On October, 1979, a Task Force Against Terrorism was created by members of the Cuban community, to help and stimulate the authorities to be forceful in their efforts against the terrorists, as it was announced by its chairman, Mr. Ricardo Feaga, in San Juan, Puerto Rico.

The terrorist elements with the Cuban community have felt very threatened by the Dialog between community representatives and the Cuban government, by the emergence of a new kind of leadership within the community which means the death of their way of living and the practical acceptance of the dialog and its results by the Cuban community.

Now, in the first anniversary of the dialog, so gruesomely celebrated by the terrorats with Mr. Negrin's death, already over three thousand political prisoners have been released, and approximately 100,000 Cubans have traveled from the U.S. to Cuba to visit their families, many for the first time in 20 years. It is the terrorists' intention to stop the Dialog, prevent the trips to Cuba or at least slow them down and ultimately to terrorize the community to prevent or retard the normalization of diplomatic relations and trade between Cuba and the U.S.

ASIAN ACTIVIST DISCUSSES IRANIAN SITUATION

By Lauren Lee

On Thursday, December 13, Yuri Kochiyama, an Asian American activist, spoke at the Asian American students Association meeting. She addressed the issue of the hostages who are being held in the U.S. Embassy by Iranian students.

"It is like a throwback to what happened in the Vietnam war and to Japanese – Americans 37 years ago," Kochiyama said, referring to the forced internment of 100,000 Japanese Americans which took place in a climate of extreme nationalistic and anti – foreign sentiment. According to Kochiyama, we must be especially concerned about those who make racist statements against Iranians today. Some of the many examples she cited were a banner at the University of Connecticut which read 'Iranians Go Home', Senator Robert Byrd who was quoted as saying 'I don't blame people for wanting to punch out Iranians', and a recent incident at a college in Greenville, South Carolina when 104 Iranian students were to be suspended until all American hostages are returned.

Kochiyama also questioned the impression of many people have of the Iranians as being militant "Terrorists". She said that the hostages have been treated well so far. They have been given "Three square meals every day" and the plush surroundings of the Embassy building itself contrast sharply with the filthy conditions of many prisons in this country. In addition, Kochiyama said that the Iranians were brought up under strick Islamic disciplinary teachings. "I think Iran has bent over backwards to treat the hostages well." However, "we should certainly be concerned about the hostages and their families," she said.

Kochiyama then recalled how Japanese – American, businesses and bank accounts were forced closed. She said that the Japanese in the camps were used as hostages in exchange to bring about the release of American prisoners of war in Japan, citing as her source Michi Weglyn's book Years of Infamy. Also, the U.S. allowed the attack on Pearl Harbor by the Japanese on December 7, 1941 with the result that communiques were sent to several Carribean and South American countries during World War II to force them to join the U.S. in condemninv Japan, Kochiyama then noted that all nine nations of the United Nations Security Council have condemned Iran for her actions.

AMERICAN GOLD

By Debbie Lee

GOLD
Gold EVERYWHERE
Golden dandelions in green fields of grass in May Golden leaves dangling form brown branches in October
Golden flames against clear nights in July
Golden stars atop blue spruces in December
All remind me of an old immigrant myth.
AMERICA
Land of riches
Reach out with your hands
And wealth is yours to reap.
Leave your homes
GO THERE
And you will want of nothing.
BUT ....what happened?
The dandelions wilted in my hand
The leaves drifted softly to the ground
The flames turned into ashes on the sand
And the stars dimmed, put away without a sound.
The golden dreams of America
Faded into long hours of toil
Making thousands of golden eggrolls
Cooking them in wells of scalding oil.

DIFFERENT, AN ALIEN IN THIS LAND
By Irene

Different, as alien in this land
Cultures that clash
Pressures in my mind
The question goes through it
An Asian – American I am
So where do I go?

A fact in life
A teasing thought
Where do you fit?
Where do you belong?
Blend in the shadows
The past is truly safe

But where is my presence today?
The walls are White
The streets are Black
But night is falling
And all is grey
I stand there

YELLOW

A mass distinguished as such
When morning comes
The white becomes White
And the black arises Black
And me...
Where am I?

CALL MYSELF ASIAN AMERICAN
By Margaret Cornell

Call myself Asian American
A dragon – snake
Coils round
Threatens you
Someone says
I am White.
Redundant.

Person of Asian descent
So secure
You are afraid
Of mere statement
You look Anywhere But at me.

You go through life
Avoiding mirrors
Barrier, alienation
So you say.

To say what I am?

Human
Without roots
Is to lose face
Is not complete
So I say.

THIRD WORLD UNDERSTANDING

"You know karate or kung fu?"
the small black boy asked me, his eyes in round amazement, as
I paid the brother for two bean pies.
"This the first time you ever meet

He shook his head affirmatively, his eyes never leaving me.
"Well, young warrior, it's like this: all chinks know kung fu like all niggers can sing and dance. Are you hip?"
The boy smiled his understanding.

Tuition may rise to meet inflation

By JACK GALLAGHER
Collegian Staff

The Committee on Student Affairs of the UMass Board of Trustees was to discuss Jan. 22 a proposed tuition increase for the Boston and Amherst campuses. That increase, which would be reviewed on a three-year basis, would be implememted according to the rate of inflation.

In the first year of the proposed three-year program, the trustees would review the budget, and then recomment changes.

The second year would be one of planning, during which time "the University and students" would have time to make necessary adjustments.

In the third year, "any changes in tuition level would be implemented" and "could be phased in over three years," reads a memorandum written by David C. Knapp, UMass president, to the trustee student affairs committee dated Jan. 14.

A section of the 14-page memorandum reads: "Increase in tuition almost surely will affect the enrollment mix. Increasingly access for lower income students will be limited. Financial aid resources are available, but rely to a greater extent than ever on loans. This kind of regressive financial aid resource clearly favors higher income students over others. There will be a need for some other financial aid resource if tuition continues to increase so that the University can be sure to offer access for all students, especially lower income students."

The trustee budget and fianance committee was to meet Jan. 23 to consider the proposed three-year plan.

Rich LaVoice, student trustee and Student Government Association co-president, said Jan. 17 he was working to have the three-year proposal amended.

SGA criticizes check on accounting system

By ED LEVINE
Collegian Staff

Student Government Association Treasurer William Fitzgerald last week called an administrative test of the University accounting system on student funding an "obstructionist tactic."

Director of Student Activities Dr. O.C. Bobby Daniels, who ordered the so-called "live test" said the move was undertaken in response to student requests for improved accounting in the student activities system.

Daniels said the test would show if University accounting is practical for use in the Recognized Student Organization system, the business operation for over 400 student groups. "The test is still in the incipience stage," he said, and it will be several weeks before any results are known.

"The RSO staff is being swamped by this new system " Fitzgerald said. "We want to find a new accounting system for RSO and this is an obstructionist tactic to prevent us from doing this. This live test is a sham. It's not really a test. It's now easy for them to drop our current system overnight."

Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs Dennis L. Madson, in an early January memo to SGA co-Presidents Rich LaVoice and Brian Burke, said the test was being conducted only to determine the feasability of the system. "While I still favor integration a fianl decision has not been made. Our current testing is not an attempt to covertly introduce a new system but is simply intended to make integration as easy as possible should that course be chosen," he said.

Madson could not be reached for comment last week.

Another effort begins to dump faculty union

By CHRISTOPHER H. SCHMITT
Collegian Staff

A group of dissatisfied faculty members is trying to toss out the faculty union -- again.

For the second time in two years, some faculty members are banding together, trying to gather signatures from instructors and librarians in the Massachusetts Society of Professors in a decertification drive. Enough signatures would force the state labor relations commission to hold an election where union members could elect to hold an election to dump the three-year-old union. State law mandates the election if signatures can be obtained from 30 percent of union membership, in this case about 1,900 members from UMass-Amherst and Boston.

A group calling itself the Faculty Freedom Task Force says it has collected over 400 of the approximately 570 signatures needed to call the election.

Forestry Prof. Joseph S. Larson, a spokesman for the task force, said the petition drive is an effort aimed at "reviewing" the union's performance 14 months after signing of the first contract. Task force members also said they have some specific grievances about how the union has worked.

"Our philosophy is that the faculty gets reviewed every year, the administration every three years, and we believe the union should be reviewed as well," Larson said.

Union leaders, on the other hand, label the "review" tenet as "somewhat devious," said Vice President John Kendall, who said the economic and political outlook for the faculty and librarians will be "dismal" without union representation.

The union is not worried about the decertification drive "insofar as the effort we will have to make if they (the task force) get enough signatures," Kendall said. He said it will divert attention from upcoming talks on a new contract, which will begin soon. The current contract expires in June. The task force has two major specific grievances with the MSP:

--They say the union has not honored requests for "conscientious objector" status from faculty members who do not wish to join the union and

--That the union has not provided the task force with a statement detailing its financial operations for the year, which the task force says is provided for by state labor law.

And together the two issues tie together into battle over what is known as an "agency fee." The fee is charged by the union to faculty members who are represented by the union, but not actual members. It is intended to cover the costs of bargaining and implementing the contract for those who do not become members. Union members, on the other hand, pay regular union dues. The agency fees and union dues currently are the same -- $195.

The objector status is granted at the option of the union to those faculty who for some reason are philosophically opposed to the union. If a union review board grants the status, the objector is then obliged to pay what would have been his/her agency fee into a fund for student scholarships. Union members say requests by faculty have been ignored, but the union says all requests have been heard. Kendall said some 70 requests have been filed, but wasn't sure how many had been granted. But, he pointed out, many of those who have been granted CO status have been members of the task force -- and that few of them have contributed the money to the scholarship fund.

The question of agency fee figures into the financial disclosure dispute because the task force says without the financial disclosures they will not know how much to pay. They

Administrators accuse SGA of misconduct

By JOE QUINLAN
Collegian Staff

A UMass administration document listing allegations of financial, personel and political misconduct in the Student Government Association has caused a further split between the two groups, already polarized over differences in proposing policy changes to the UMass Board of Trustees last semester.

The 31-page document was attributed to the vice chancellor of student affairs office, but student government criticism has been aimed at Dean of Students William F. Field, who reportedly was more involved than Vice Chancellor Dennis L. Madson.

The document, reportedly written to explain the administration's differences with student government leaders, first offers the administration's perspective on the history of student government and then alledges specific violations of affirmative action procedures and other University policies.

Student government President Richard LaVoice said the document "does not have much credibility in our eyes."

"We're not afraid of it, but we feel angered that we have to dispel old fears," LaVoice said.

During intersession, LaVoice and other student leaders held at least two meetings with staffers of several student government offices to discuss how to respond to the document. And Dean Field, who claims he did not intend to publicize the document to discredit student government, said, "I'm not going to lose the battle" if the student government attempts to make the document a political issue.

Among the student government practices alledged to have violated University policies were:

•--the firing of three Legal Services Office attorneys last year for reasons of "lack of work and/or funds," and then hiring three other attorneys for the same positions.

•--eliminating the requirement for one of the legal service attorney positions that the applicant be a member of the Massachusetts Bar--a standard requirement--and then hiring Michael Pill as the new attorney. Pill, a member of the Iowa Bar, is not a member of the Massachusetts Bar and therefore unable to practice law in the Commonwealth's courts.

•--"gross violations" of UMass affirmative action policies in the Student Activities Office, the business office for student claim that some of the agency fee will go toward political and advertising causes, not the legitimate purposes only of "servicing" the contract. Without details of the union's operation, task force members say, they cannot know how much they should pay.

The union, on the other hand, readily concedes that some money will be used for political and advertising purposes, but Kendall says any such money will be rebated to payers of the agency fee. Kendall says the only reason such rebates have not yet been given out is because "it takes a while to figure it out."

Larson was once head of a group of professors on campus which favored using the American Association of University Professors as the faculty's union, instead of the MSP. Whether the current effort to decertify the union will evolve into a pro-AAUP move isn't known, but Larson professes that it won't at least for now.

"There's no interest in bringing in any other union," he said. "The experience of the past three years has shown there is much to be desired with collective bargaining. I regard the election as an opportunity for the faculty to pass judgement on the Union's efforts."

Kendall said faculty members have already had four occasions to pass judgement on the union: two elections in late 1976 and early 1977 when they elected the MSP as the union, 18 months ago when they turned down another decertificaton drive, and 14 months ago when the first contract was signed.

"This is not the annual academic exercise it is being portrayed as," he said of the task force's "review" effort. "They are misguided in the extreme in mounting this effort now, especially in the face of possible retrenchment (cutbacks in faculty) and reorganization of higher ed."

posed in 1976 in response to accounting problems in the current system. Administration officials at the time expressed concerns that audit procedures were not being followed by the system and audits of the system were virtually impossible.

Last semester Madson organized a committee to study the transition into University accounting, scheduled to be done at the end of last semester. This Transition Review Team was rebuked by SGA officials who organized their own transition review team. Then, in late October, the UMass Board of Trustees, the University governing body, agreed to allow the SGA to find its own accounting system and said RSO did not have to enter University accounting. The Trustees said the SGA should report their results to the board in April.

"It is very difficult for a new system to be built while the live test is going on," Rich Moran, SGA assistant treasurer and Campus Center Board of Governors finance committee chairperson said last week. Moran has been working with accounting firms in an attempt to design the new accounting system.

Moran said the SGA would conduct a "needs analysis" of the RSO system in order to determine what accounting system would suit its needs. The analysis may be conducted either by a team of graduate students from the School of Business Administration or an outside private accounting firm, he said.

'We want to find a new accounting system for RSO and this (administrative action) is an obstructionist tactic to prevent us from doing this.

Union court case looms as precedent?

By CHRISTOPHER H. SCHMITT
Collegian Staff

A Northampton judge has taken under advisement a request by a UMass professor to move from Small Claims Court to District Court a dispute involving payment of the UMass faculty union "agency fee".

The union, the Massachusetts Society of Professors, has filed suit asking School of Business Administration Prof. Ben Branch to pay $84 to the union in agencies fees. The money is paid to the union by non-union members to cover the cost of bargaining and implementing the faculty's current contract with the University.

Branch is not a union member, and he is disputing the fee because he and other faculty members organized into a group called the Faculty Freedom Task Force say some of the fee is being used improperly.

They say some of the fee is being used for political and advertising costs, instead of solely for the purpose of "servicing" the contract.

Branch is seeking to move the case to district court because he believes the decision may act as a precedent which would affect other UMass professors who have not chosen to pay the fee to the union, the Massachusetts Society of Professors. Together with faculty and librarians at UMass-Boston, the union represents about 1900 members.

"I'm not terribly optimistic," Branch said of the case. "We may have to try it in Small Claims court. I don't intend to concede. I intend to appeal this as long as there is an avenue for appeal."

Future appeals could go to the Superior Court.

The MSP has readily admitted that some of the fee is used for political and advertising costs, but has said that rebates will be given to those who have paid the agency fee. Union spokesman John Kendall said delays in processing have caused the rebates not to be issued.

organizations.

•--risking at least $100,000 by not signing the contract with the Grateful Dead rock band for last year's Spring Concert until after the concert began. Although the money could have been lost because the contract signing was delayed, student government leaders later rejected a proposed policy that would have required completing contracts before the perfomances.

•--the disappearance of at least $13,000 during the first six months that the original Union Record Shop operated in 1978. An audit later stated much of the money was "stolen" by either student employees or customers.

•--harassing student attorneys general--who are appointed by the student president--when they investigate practices in other areas of student government.

•--hiring of student senators by several student government agencies--specifically by the Student Center for Educational Research and Advocacy--whose budgets are appropriated by these senators.

The document described other incidents of misconduct among student government leaders that had been resolved.

The document stated that "transiency" in the student government could be responsible for some of the personel incidents, but that others represented "outright abuses" of policies.

The report was prepared during a time last semester when administrators and student leaders were at constant odds over several issues, especially an administrative effort to convert to its computer system the student business office's accounting system. The administration also insisted that professional staff in the business office should not be accountable to student leaders, whose budgets are audited by that office.

Complicating their disputes over issues was a feeling by some administrators that student leaders were continually taking their cases to the Board of Trustees after they appeared to be in agreement with campus administrators.

The document, which may be sent to trustees, was prepared after student leaders failed to meet with Dean Field to discuss their differences. The meeting had been arranged by Stephen Klein, Collegian editor-in-chief, who later received a copy of the document.

UM professors discuss Iran, Afghanistan

By JIM LENNOX
Collegian Staff

The recent crises in Iran and Afghanistan have led many Americans to wonder just how serious things are abroad, and to question how the United States is handling its foreign affairs. Three UMass professors offered their views on this subject and though diverse in opinion, each expresses a hopeful, realistic outlook for the future.

Political Science Professor Karl Ryavec, does not foresee an early release of the hostages, but considers it significant that they have been treated well during their captivity. He noted the crew of the "Pueblo," an American ship captured by North Koreans and held for over a year, and was often mistreated during the ordeal.

Ryavec believes that an eventual release is possible, after negotiations that would eliminate any loss of Iranian face. The fact that the students holding the hostages are independent from Khomeini's regime makes negotiations difficult, Ryavec said.

When questioned about the animosity between Khomeini and moderate Egyptian leader Anwar Sadat, Ryavec noted that despite the apparent benefit to U.S. interests, the ongoing rift between different Islamic groups gives an opening to the Soviets. The U.S.S.R. is already providing aid to Iran, and this can effectively neutralize any economic restrictions we may make against Iran, Ryavec said.

One plus for U.S. interests is the repercussions started from the Soviet agression in Afghanistan, Ryavec said. With worldwide outrage increasing, leftist groups in Iran must tread carefully, Islamic groups are not in favor of Soviet intevention, he said. The Soviets, who actually killed their own people in Afghanistan, provoked far more outcry than they expected and possible Third World disenchantment may prove to be more of a drawback than expected, he said.

'This is not a new 'Cold War.' — Prof. Ryavec

SALT II

Ryavec believes Strategic Arms Limitations Talks II will be stagnant for a while, but that it is not dead. The Salt II talks did not go smoothly in the Senate and this will allow it to remain quiet for a time.

"This is not a new 'Cold War'," Ryavec said of the Afghanistan situation. "The U.S. hasn't moved any troops anywhere and the U.S.-U.S.S.R. relations remain intact."

Ryavec predicted a two or three-year period for American-Russian relations to normalize however.

Ryavec believes there is little doubt the current crises will be fuel for opposition presidential campaigning, but it is unlikely that any great mileage will be gained for the respective candidates.

"Carter's handling of the crises has probably improved his image overall," Ryavec said. What may prove important in the elections, however, is Carter's future reactions. Possible new crises, which Carter might have to face, Ryavec predicted, include a major breakup of Iran, strong resurgence of Islam, or even possible danger for Sadat.

Political Science Prof. Eric Einhorn, although emphasizing he was not a specialist on the Iranian situation, said he believes the hostages will be released eventually, but not in the near future.

"There have been several precedents for a long incarceration and that the hostages will not be released until their utility is completely exhausted," he said.

Khomeini

"Khomeini was a surprise to the U.S. He is an untraditional leader, an untwentieth century leader. Desire for vengeance was underestimated when we allowed the Shah into the country," Einhorn said.

On leadership of the Carter administration, Prof. Einhorn gave a 'B-minus.'

Khomeini is not actually ruling Iran, at least not in the sense of rebuilding and moving forward, he said. The country is falling apart; the economic situation is precarious; there is no cultural revolution, but rather confusion, Einhorn said.

Einhorn noted Khomeini's support is a coalition of diverse interests. Strong Islamic groups tentatively joined with leftist groups. The Soviets are not popular with Islamic groups, and the leftists are not pleased to return to the more severe culture that Khomeini advocates, he said. Khomeini is not in favor of the modernization of Iran, and this has alienated him from many people, Einhorn said. But attempts by the leftists to steer the course of events has been jolted by the Soviet activities in Afghanistan and for the time being the leftists walk hand-in-hand with the Islamic groups.

On leadership of the Carter administration, Einhorn gave a "B-minus." "I don't think the crisis coud have occurred unless the government was out of touch with the true Iranian situation or was interpreting the data incorrectly." Einhorn added, however, he believed that reaction and handling of the situation has been adequate. He believes Carter's calmness and disinterest in adopting "a macho image" has kept the situation (at press time) from getting out of hand.

Iran is angry over 150 years of abuse, the result of bad judgement and "well-intentioned blundering." — Prof. Lewis

In looking at the Afghanistan situation, Einhorn noted the U.S. had no influence in Afghanistan and therefore lost none, but that the invasion was symbolically important. Referring to a recent New York Times editorial, he remarked that the Soviet invasion breaks the 1950's unspoken agreement over East-West boundary lines, and perhaps indicates the Soviet feeling that Western powers will react only when their pocketbooks are at stake.

History Prof. Archibald Lewis, who has lived in Iran, sees the Iranian situation as less shocking than the others. Comparing the Iranian antagonism to American-British hostility at this country's beginning, Lewis thinks the U.S. is bearing the brunt of Iran's anger over 150 years of foreign abuse. This abuse is not all the fault of the U.S. but its bad judgement and "well-intentioned blundering."

Women, family, change topic of women's week

By FRAN BASCHE
Collegian Staff

If the 1970's were marked by extensive legal victories for women, the 1980's have promised to either accept them on a personal basis or challenge them, as evidenced by the fight over the Equal Rights Amendment.

It is in this atmosphere that the UMass steering committee for International Women's Week chose, "Women, Family and Social Change," as the theme for the week, scheduled for March 3 through March 8.

Steering committee member Margaret Reid said the theme is "non-threatening" and serves the committee's goal of "trying to attract as many different types of people as possible."

Ellie Bagli, also on the nine-member committee, said the week will not be a Five College effort as it was last year, although events will be scheduled so the times do not conflict.

Bagli said the week will include one main speaker, a panel discussion, two performing arts events and one theater event, as well as an assortment of discussions and workshops. She said the committee wants the workshops to relate directly to the theme and will also include skills workshops such as one sponsored by the Women's Media Network on video tape making.

Bagli said Women's Week is not receiving as much funding as it has in the past and a fundraising committee has been formed.

The Distinguished Visitors Program, which has in the past aided the committee in lining up speakers for the week, is not contributing as much money this year although they are hoping to bring historian Barbara Wortheimer, author of We were There to speak during the week.

The discussion will include people from various parts of the UMass women's community who will duscuss what the family and social change means in their lives, Bagli said.

"Being involved in social change issues affects people's personal lives," Reid said. "Women are beginning to take control of their lives," she said, and this affects them as family members. She said collective parenthood, lesbian motherhood and the extended family represent ways in which women's role in the family has changed.

This is the fourth year International Women's Week has been celebrated at UMass. The first Women's Day in the United States began March 8, 1857 when women garment workers marched through the lower East Side of Manhattan demanding higher pay, a ten hour work day and improvement of working conditions.

Sixty-one years later thousands of women needle trades workers marched again, this time adding legislation against child labor and the right to vote in their demands. At an international socialist convention in 1911 March 8 was declared as International Women's Day in commemoration of women's role in the struggle to change society. It came two years after a militant and often bloody strike by women shirtwaist operators, during which several demands, such as working fire escapes, were never discussed. In March 1911 hundreds of women died in a fire in the Triangle Shirtwaist Factory Building attempting to escape the flames.

Chancellor Henry Koffler

Dear Mom and Dad; Koffler writes home

By ROBERT E. STEIN
Collegian Staff

UMass Chancellor Henry Koffler sent a letter to all students' parents Jan. 3 praising the University, outlining steps to "improve the quality of campus life" and reduce campus vandalism.

After the University received some "rather unfortunate publicity from an article in Boston Magazine" the chancellor wanted to "inform people of what the situation is," Provost Jeremiah Allen said recently.

Koffler's letter states, "Actions we have taken or plan to take include revisions of the campus policies governing the use of alcohol; improved lighting in specific areas; more effective control of access to campus buildings through new guest and visitors policies; and increased policing of areas with a relatively high incidence of violence or vandalism."

The chancellor will also be creating a special commission comprised of faculty, students and staff to assess the general climate of the campus, Allen said.

The Boston Magazine article, "UMass Horrors," coupled with instances of violence and vandalism last semester created what the chancellor considered an unfavorable image of the University.

"Unfortunately, our flaws are given undeserved prominence. Public perceptions of the University are at times inaccurate or misleading, and we are often frustrated by the feeling that our accomplishments are taken for granted and our problems magnified," the letter stated.

The letter outlined a means to "hold students accountable for their actions."

"We have begun a program in which students taken into protective custody by the police (generally for alcohol detoxification) are required to meet with a member of the Dean of Students' staff to discuss the consequences of their misbehavior on their status in the University," the letter stated.

The letter, generally optimistic, praised the fine reputation of the University, stating, "The time has come for those of us who share a sense of pride in the University to show our support. We can only achieve our full potential if prospective students, legislators and others with an interest in the University perceive clearly the importance of this institution in the life of the Commonwealth."

The Chancellor could not be reached for comment.

Building reform laws in the making

By RICHARD NAGLE
Collegian Staff

A sweeping restructuring of the state's public building procedure is in its first stages and is on the way through the law-making process.

Legislative recommendations, which cover every aspect of state construction procedures, result from a year-long investigation of the Special Commission Concerning State and County Buildings.

The commission, referred to as the Ward Commission after its chairman, former Amherst College President John W. Ward, recommended in its December report "a total reorganization of the management of public construction in Massachusetts."

The UMass Building Authority's similar procedures would also fall under these reforms.

The elimination of the state Bureau of Building Construction was recommended by the commission. The BBC would be replaced by the Bureau of Project Management, one of three new bureaus that would be organized under a new Division of Capital Operations.

It was the BBC that oversaw the construction of several ill-fated projects including the UMass main library and the Tilson steam plant.

The reform recommendations fall into four principal areas, including planning and budgeting; designer and contractor selection; management of construction and enforcement of state construction standards to minimize waste and corruption.

The commission calls for the creation of a new Division of Capital Planning to oversee long-range planning and financing of all state projects, while providing expert assistance to the legislature, the report says.

Some students are not aware they are eligible for aid

By JACK GALLAGHER
Collegian Staff

Even in the off season, stacks of papers grow there. They usually grow in boxes, too, boxes that stack like the papers in them.

Spring is the regular season for the Financial Aid office in the Whitmore Administration Building: 20,000 pieces of paper, many of which have staples in them that attach many other papers to them, are received then by the office.

Other people send their pieces of paper to the office in the off season, though. Sometimes it works, and sometimes it doesn't.

The main problem, though, is how those papers the office receives are filled out, said Ed Apodaca, office director.

People scribble on their applications. They don't fill them out completely. The send them in too late.

And students don't even know that they are eligible to receive aid, as well, Apodaca said.

Seventy percent of UMass students are eligible for aid, he said. That percentage transforms into $28 million this year and $35 million next year, he said.

Further, the majority of students on aid are from middle and upper-income families, contrary to the popular conception of financial aid.

The $28 million figure is inclusive rather than exclusive, however. Higher Education Loan Program grants, for instance, account for $12 million that the office administers. And another $7 million goes to Basic Education Opportunity Grant recipients.

Thus, Apodaca said, the money is there, and the office to administer it is, too. Probems arise when the applicant errs in filling out the forms.

Of the possible discrepancies, the most frequent is tax forms. All figures are checked, Apodaca said, so if the Internal Revenue Service says the applicant or the applicant's family earns a certain amount of money, then the corresponding numerical figure on the aid form must match.

When discrepancies arise, the application is put aside while the others are processed. That means the applicant may not receive his aid when he needs it. And that leads to more problems for the office and the applicant.

Apodaca jokingly says that some people in the office don't like students, and that if the applications are filled out correctly the people in the office will never see the student. And then everyone will be happy.

Philosophy changed

Apodaca, sitting behind his simulated-wood desk, said the way in which financial aid is looked at has changed in the last few years.

Just about everyone is eligible for aid, which formerly was not the case, he said. Applicants from low-income families have traditionally been aid recipients. But now everyone is eligible, just about, he said.

The federal government is much more lenient as to who receives aid. And while other University agencies are being hit by budget cuts, the financial aid office's expenditures have increased.

He said that trend should continue and increase, too.

HELP

For instance, recipients no longer have a limit as to how much they can earn for on-campus (03) employment, in most cases. Because HELP is now considered an outside source of aid, the office disregards it when considering the amount of aid that a student can receive.

On the other hand, though, the federal government has increased its audits of financial aid systems throughout the country, Apodaca said.

That means his office has to be more careful about the amount of money it administers.

And that could mean more bureaucracy, he said.

TI calculators are helping solve Olympic scoring problems.

Get a problem solver that's solving problems in the real world.

The more your courses approach the problems of the real world, the more you need a calculator that's already there.

These two programmable calculators from Texas Instruments can take you from your engineering courses right into the ranks of professionals like the ones who created the complex programs to simplify and speed up scoring at the Winter Olympics.

The TI Programmable 58C lets you spend your time learning concepts instead of working problems. $130*.

Perhaps your current calculator can solve advanced engineering problems, but you'll probably spend a lot of time doing it. With the TI-58C's 480 program steps or up to 60 memories, plus 170 keyboard functions and operations, you'll be amazed at just how much of the work the TI-58C will do for you.

The TI-58C has a Constant Memory™ feature that lets you lock a program in the machine — even when it's turned off. You can program the calculator as you learn in class and use it later to review the concept and work the problems. You can store results or data in the calculator, even if you turn it off, for later use.

The TI-58C will seem like more than a calculator — it's computer-like capabilities let you design your own programs or use Texas Instruments unique plug-in Solid State Software™ modules with ready-to-use programs. A Master Library module (included with the calculator) has 25 basic programs in math, statistics, and other areas of general interest. Twelve optional library modules include programs on applied statistics, advanced mathematical routines, electrical engineering, business decisions, and much more.

With all of its capabilities and functions the TI-58C is simple to operate using TI's AOS™ algebraic operating system. The AOS entry system lets you enter problems the way they are written — from left to right — and handles up to 9 levels of parentheses in accordance with the rules of algebraic hierarchy.

With the TI-58C you'll also get a copy of Personal Programming, an owner's manual that'll help get you started in programming — even if you've never programmed before.

The TI Programmable 59 goes from engineering to the Winter Olympics. $300*.

The reason the Winter Olympics chose the TI-59 for verifying scoring results at many events is the same reason it can help you get all you can from your courses — versatility.

Up to 960 program steps or up to 100 memories plus 4 types of display testing, 10 user flags, 72 labels, and 6 levels of subroutines let the power of programming help you make short work of complex problems.

Even with all the 175 keyboard functions and operations at your command, the TI-59 responds to simple AOS algebraic entry system control. So the calculator becomes part of the solution — not part of the problem.

The TI-59 uses Texas Instruments Solid State Software modules and comes with the Master Library module. You also get the added versatility and capability of magnetic cards to record your own programs. With them you can also tie into programs on modules for extended programming routines.

You'll get a copy of Personal Programming with your new TI-59 that'll help you get all the power we put into it. And the book can start you programming even if you've never tried it before.

If you're starting on the way to a career in engineering get a calculator that'll help you get there. And get one that'll continue to serve you well on the job.

See the whole line of advanced Texas Instruments calculators at your college bookstore or at other TI dealers everywhere.

Frosh: We've all been there

By ED LEVINE
Collegian Staff

UMass is a jungle.

Behind every doorway, down every corridor, someone is there who is out to get you. Or so it seems to new students.

We were all freshmen or new transfers once. We all know what it can be like. UMass is big, it's scary and it is intimidating. But, like a wild animal, it can be captured and tamed, to be used to your own advantage.

You can make this place whatever you want it to be.

First, however, you have to know how to get around. Study a map of the campus, available at the assistance desk in the Campus Center. Walk around and familiarize yourself with the area. Amherst is a beautiful little town and you should get to know it as you know UMass.

If you don't have a car, don't worry. UMass and the Five College area has an excellent bus system. (Weekends and holidays can be a bit difficult, though.) The busses can get you wherever you need to go in the area. Schedules are available at the assistance desk or watch the Collegian for information.

Your first really bad experience at UMass will probably occur in the dining commons. Yes, that's food on your plate and, believe it or not your supposed to eat it. Rest assured, though, it tastes just as bad as it looks. Don't worry, you'll get used to it quickly.

Then there are the dormitories. You've probably already moved in by now and are still trying to get settled. Well, good luck. Though dorms never quite feel like home, they can be fun, and, at times quite cozy. Maybe it's all that concrete, or the noise, or the lack of space. Don't worry, though, you'll grow to like it.

Joy riding

If you're in Southwest and at the top of a tower, watch out. Unless you're an incredible athlete or a masochist, or both, you probably will rely solely on the elevators to get to your floor. Simple, huh? Well, we've got a surprise for you. Good luck trying to get on an elevator after dinner or, especially, during fire alarms. Twenty-one flights of stairs at 4:30 in the morning is not fun.

If you do have a dorm problem, tell your head of residence or your residential assistant. They're both there to help so don't hesitate to go to them. Their advice and friendship can be invaluable.

By now you've probably been to dozens of wild parties and met many fascinating people. If not, if you are a little bit shy about meeting people, take heart. You're not alone. Many people feel the same way. The best way to meet new people is simply to walk up to them and say hello. Drop in on the people across the hall or next door. They're in the same boat and want to meet new people. After all, they're going to be your neighbors for at least the next four months, and through them you'll meet other people too. You'll be surprised at how many friends you will make.

Another good way to meet people is to get involved in student activities. There are over 400 student organizations ranging from government to the media to crafts to frisbee throwing and everything else in between. Special programs are also offered to students with particular social interests and backgrounds. Ask around and talk to people about these groups or check the Collegian for announcements of meetings.

Finally, let us not forget why we are here. Believe it or not, academics will be the most important part of your school career. The academic policies and procedures of this school are confusing and sometimes seem like they're designed to throw you off guard, But they can be deciphered, if you make the effort.

If you sign up for a course and change your mind at the start of the semester, it's easy to drop it and add another. There are 14 school days from the start of the semester when you can do this. All you do is go to the Registrars office in the Whitmore Administration building (that's the big white one that looks like a fort) and get an add/drop form. Simply fill it out, have the instructor or a department representative sign the form and return it to the registrar. That's it. It's simple.

"Whitless"

Speaking of Whitmore, (which many refer to as "Whitless") don't let the place intimidate you. It may seem people there do this deliberately, but don't let them scare you. They are supposed to be there to serve you. Make them earn their pay. If you need any help with financial aid, records, housing, or whatever, just go to the appropriate office and ask.

For academic advice find a counselor from your academic department. Counselors are faculty members and they know their stuff. You can also go to the College of Arts and Sciences Information and Advising Center located in Bartlett Hall. If you're majoring in a subject within the College of Arts and Sciences, drop in to CASIAC and ask for help. They're students, they know what you're going through and they can and will help.

So that's how to handle UMass. Most of what you learn will come from experience. There's a lot to know but one semester here will teach you a lot. Enjoy it, make the most of it and do with it what you will. This place can indeed by anything you want it to be.

Enrollment drops as frosh arrive

By CAROL ROSENBERG
Collegian Staff

More than 375 freshpersons are expected to make their debut on campus this semester, indicating the start of an anticipated enrollment decline in colleges and universities statewide.

Director of Freshmen Admissions Diedre Kedesdy contrasted the mid-January enrolled freshpersons for the 1980 spring semester with spring 1979 figures as evidence of the decline: 373 first semester freshmen for the 1980 semester and 427 for the 1979.

More freshpersons were expected to have paid their bills prior to the start of the semester, Kedesdy said.

She said the decrease of about 50 students marked the "beginnings of a projected enrollment decline in Massachusetts that will continue through 1995."

Kedesdy noted the figures are slightly deceptive, pointing to the fall semester freshperson enrollment as the largest in the University's history. She said less students were promised admission in the second semester.

The incoming freshpersons are "traditional," Kedesdy said, with "very few people over 21" years of age.

The greatest part of the incoming class are enrolled in the faculty of Arts and Sciences, 284, with two students each in the faculties of Health Sciences and Physical Education. Sixteen students have been enrolled in the School of Business Administration, 17 in the School of Engineering, 40 in the School of Food and Natural Resources, and five in the School of Education.

Kedesdy noted little significant change in the number of transfer students accepted for the upcoming semester: 523 for the 1980 spring semester and 539 for the 1979 spring term.

Earthfoods — an alternative

By STEVE WESTRA
Collegian Staff

Eating lunch on campus can mean more than fast-food—it can even be entertaining, educational and healthful.

This is the idea and purpose of Earthfoods, a 22-member vegetarian cooperative located next to the ballrom in the Student Union Building

Earthfoods, as the name suggests, serves only natural foods which contain no preservatives, additives, coloring or any other chemicals. The group buys all the food they prepare from local growers and other cooperatives because of the quality of the food and because of their committment to a cooperative style of living.

Cooperation is essential to all aspects of the Earthfoods organization. Every member belongs to a committee and each committee has a separate responsibility. The Menu Committee, for instance, plans meals with information from vegetarian cook books making sure each meal contains the proper balance of nutrients. "We really care about the food we put out; it is a reflection on us," member Tinker Ready said.

The group's concern does not stop in the kitchen. Members believe they can be of service to the community by providing a variety of information in their dining area. They distribute educational materials, boycott information, alternative energy information and other information. "We help any group that is for the people," member Buddy Fesentes said.

One group they help, for example, is Oxfam, a worldwide organization dedicated to fighting starvation. Earthfoods donated all its proceeds of one day last semester to Oxfam.

Earthfoods also encourages people to join their cooperative effort. Anyone who wants can volunteer for one hour of work in exchange for a meal. Most days the hungry volunteers include talented musicians who perform or just practice in the dining hall.

Shortage expected when INDEX arrives

A shortage is expected when the 1979 INDEXs, the UMass yearbooks, arrive on campus in late March, the 1980 editor-in-chief June Kokturk announced during intersession.

Kokturk said a variety of production problems caused the late printing of the 288-page book, ususally available to students during the fall semester. Yearbooks will be sent to the home addresses of all 1979 graduates and 2,500 books will be available to undergraduates. In addition, 100 of those books are set aside for contributors and staff. Kokturk said she would like to see some kind of seniority system used to distribute the books.

Undergraduates must present their INDEX cards and pay $3 to receive a book. The $3 payment was mandated by the Undergraduate Student Senate to make the yearbook a "fiscally independent" organization, she said.

A shortage is also expected for the 1980 book. Kokturk, who has worked on the yearbook for two years, said she hoped the shortage would increase the demand for the book as well as generate support. "People are hesitant to contribute," she said, and that leaves the bulk of the responsibility to 10 editors, each paid $51 per semester for their work.

The 1979 budget was $26,878 while the 1980 yearbook staff is operating with $18,164—about an $8,000 cut.

Typesetting for the book will now be done on the Student Senate machines in the Student Union building, which, in addition to cutting the number of books published, reduces the overall costs of each book. However, the INDEX was not allocated money to pay for a typesetter and revenues for the 1980 book were overestimated, Kokturk said.

The INDEX business manager is planning a campaign for advertisements in the yearbook to pay for additional items such as color pictures and special effects, which are not included in the $42,000 printing bill. "It was either cut the quality or cut the amount," Kokturk said.

UM appeals to industries for $5.5M fund drive

UMass launched a campaign to raise $5.5 million for its School of Engineering this month, with Gov. Edward J. King's vocal support and his own donation of $250 to back it up.

UMass President David C. Knapp said at a Jan. 17 press conference attended by King, that most of the money will come from high technology industries in the state "since industrial leaders recognize that industry stands to gain substantially from better-trained engineering graduates."

The $5.5 million will be used to ensure that engineering teaching equipment is up to date, he said.

King endorsed the proposed alliance between UMass and state businesses and told Knapp he would donate $250 of "unused campaign" money to the engineering school. King last year ordered UMass trustees to cut their budget request by 10 percent and the campaign drive is said to be an alternate means of funding the University is exploring.

Amherst campus Chancellor Henry Koffler, who took office in September, called the current engineering fund-raising drive a pilot project, which will determine future UMass-state industry relationships.

"It is a mutually helpful partnership," Koffler said. "Industry has to be concerned about what UMass does because they get their main source of manpower from us. Studies show half of our graduates remain to work in the state. We have a lot of expertise, and faculty and students with insight who can help develop industry," he said.

Studies show approximately half of the 6,000 engineers UMass has graduated have elected to remain in the state. Undergrauate enrollment in engineering at UMass has increased from 900 students in 1973 to 2,100 in 1979. The Massachusetts High Technology Council, Inc., an organization of high technology industrial firms, expects that between 3,000 to 4,000 new engineers will be needed in industry yearly at least over the next three years.

Koffler said increased funding of the engineering school will not be detrimental to UMass liberal arts departments. He said he has encouraged all departments to apply for federal funds and private endowments in the face of budget cuts and said funding from these source has increased in almost every area of the school.

The end of a dark decade

The '70's left little to cheer about

By ED LEVINE
Collegian Staff

It happened four weeks ago.

There was fanfare, but not what had been expected. People shouted about it, cursed it and then forgot it. Indeed, they should have. It was not something of which to feel proud.

The 1970's have come to a close. A decade that this nation entered suffering from Vietnam, one of the worst tragedies in history, and ended with the nation suffering another terrible malady. Many thought we couldn't survive, but we did. Whether we will survive the next 10 years, or even the next one, remains to be seen.

We did survive the 1970's. Somehow, in retrospect, it seems like a miracle. We began the decade engaged in the most bitter war our nation has ever seen. Vietnam caused not only 56,000 American deaths on the battlefield, but led to death and destruction on our own soil. Not from our "enemy," however, from ourselves. We also lost face worldwide.

Our nation was bitterly divided as we entered the 1970's. The war, the actions of our government, has split the people of the United States. The seeds of protest that had been planted in the 1960's blossomed in the 1970's. The "Age of Aquarius" had reached adolescence and began to voice its opinions loudly, often violently.

Violent protest became the order of the day in the early years of the decade. Violence led to violence, which in turn led to further unrest. In 1970 that violence erupted at Kent State University where four student demonstrators were fatally shot by National Guard troops.

Kent State typified the atmonsphere of the early 70's. Opposition to the war was growing. Americans were fighting Americans in the streets and on college campuses. All over a small nation called Vietnam, for what government leaders called "democracy."

The war ended with the fall of Saigon in April of 1975. Saigon became Ho Chi-Minh City. America lost the war and along with so many men. Our government admitted its mistake, grudgingly, and vowed it would not repeat it. It did, however. Instead of troops and advisors, the CIA did the work. In Chile and Iran and several other countries the United States continued its anti-Communist policies. Finally, at the decade's close, this policy exploded in our faces.

Nov. 4, 1979, militant students stormed the United States embassy in Tehran, Iran, taking more than 50 hostages. The students demanded the return of the deposed shah, who was in exile in New York, being treated for cancer. For years, the U.S. government had supported the shah and his repressive government. The students were blaming the United States for welcoming the shah, and demanded this nation makes amends.

The militants in Iran vowed loyalty to one man--the Ayatollah Khomeini who had assumed power following the shah's downfall. He had taken measures designed to "de-westernize" Iran. he banned music, co-ed bathing, and ordered women to wear veils when apearing in public. The Ayatollah threatened war with the United States and demanded the Western power leave Iran.

So it seems the United States is now paying for its mistakes. As the hostages are still being held in the embassy, another crises has arised that has far more serious implications. Not just for the United States, but the entire world.

Soviet troops invaded Afghanistan and proceeded to topple the government and execute its leader. The United States and other Western powers condemned the action. Tension rose worldwide and continues to remain high. While the future seems uncertain, diplomats are still attempting to condemn one another for the world's problems.

The United States government faced an equally serious crises in the 70's. The crisis, however, was internal. In June of 1972 the offices of the Democratic National Committee, located in the Watergate Hotel were burglarized. An investigation ensued and government officials were implicated. The implications led right to the top, to the President of the United States.

On August 9, 1974, Richard M. Nixon, 37th president of the United States, resigned. Nixon was the first president to do so and left the nation with a man in the Oval Office not popularly elected by the citizens of the nation. As Gerald R. Ford took office, the nation attempted to put Watergate behind, to forget about it and to strive to prevent its recurrence.

Watergate shook the very foundations of government, but it withstood the tremors. Many of the nation's top officials had resigned, but the government carried on. Officials praised our system for holding out, for surviving the crises.

Watergate is behind us now. Congress put safeguards into the election and campaign process to insure it wouldn't happen again. But we can't really be sure it won't happen again.

Summarizing the 1970's in one column is not easy. So much happened: the rise of political terrorism; the massacre of Israeli athletes at the 1972 Olympic Games in Munich, Germany; the death of hundreds of people at the cult colony in Jonestown, Guyana. There was more, so much more. Both good and bad.

Ten years is a long time. So many experiences were shared by so many people. Each individual will carry their own memories of the 70's.People may choose to remember or forget them. Whatever they do, they cannot deny the 70's made an impact. Our lives are different as we enter the 1980's. Hopefully, we will survive the next ten years.

Bay state drivers idle at 2,000 intersections

By JACK GALLAGHER
Collegian Staff

The figures are inconsistent, and sometimes even conflicting. But one thing is certain: Massachusetts drivers are idlers compared with those in the other 49 states.

According to the state Department of Public Works, one intersection in three allows motorists to turn right when the traffic light is red, after stopping. But nationwide, that figure averages 80 to 95 percent, according to the Federal Highway Safety Administration,

Massachusetts, which implemented the right-on-red law Jan. 1, was the last state in the nation to adopt the law, a traffic rule intended to save gasoline and reduce collisions. The state Legislature passed the law last year, after the federal governmnet threatened to cut off highway funds.

Originally, DPW had estimated only 10 percent of the state's 3,000 intersections were open to right turns on red. But now, that figure is estimated at 33 percent.

Of the seven intersections in Amherst that have traffic lights, none allows right turns on red, said Stan Ziomek of the town DPW.

"We haven't gotten any encouragement for right on red," Ziomek said, adding that the state has been conservative in its implementation of the newly passed law.

Ziomek said most of the roads in Amherst that have traffic lights are one-lane roads, anyway; and that the first car in line might be able to go right but that others wouldn't.

He said the town would be reviewing the right-turn-on-red law in the course of the year.

Complaints can be aired

New group: Stop harassment

By JULIE EAGLE
Collegian Staff

Women's Issues Team members--who last semester researched the problem of sexual harassment of female students by male faculty and employees--are working to begin a new group to address the problem.

The alleviation of on-campus sexual harassment is a number one priority for the team, a member of the Student Center for Educational Research and Advocacy.

Team members call the problem at UMass "very common."

The new Recognized Student Organization, to be called Students Against Sexual Harassment, will give harassed students an outlet to air their complaints, team member Elli Bagli announced over intersession. SASH volunteers will collect affidavits from such students, will provide counseling and will serve "to prove that we need a formal grievance procedure," Bagli said.

Team members are working on a proposal for the procedure, which they hope to complete by March, Bagli said. Such a procedure, if approved by the Undergraduate Student Senate, the Graduate Student Senate and administrators, would enable students with documentation of their harassment to testify before a student, administrative and faculty group empowered to fire offending employees.

SASH will serve "to start building strategy" for implementing the procedure when approve, Bagli said.

Until the procedure is approved, Bagli said, harassed students have the following means for airing their grievances: contacting the Amherst Police Department, which can issue a warrant; filing a complaint of sexual harassment at Northampton District Court under Title IX or sending a SASH volunteer to approach the offending professor and give him a warning.

Getting SASH underway, Bagli said, involves a simple procedure all RSO groups must follow: bringing a group statement to the RSO Office on the fourth floor of the Student Union Building. There, the new group, whose statement must be signed by 12 members, can be approved.

The women's team is also distributing surveys to 650 randomly-selected female UMass students. The surveys, Bagli said, will ask students of personal experience with sexual harassment in the classroom, and will be distributed this week.

Another team project involves informing administrators of campus areas that need improved lighting.

Rotary Club scholarships available

Springfield's Rotary Club is now accepting applications for Rotary Foundation Awards for one year of study in a foreign country, starting in the summer of 1981.

The deadline for filing applicaitons is March 1, and award recipients will be announced in September, 1980.

Awards provide tuition, travel expenses, room and board for one academic year for the following: graduate fellowships, undergraduate scholarships, technical training awards, teachers of handicapped, and journalism awards.

Both men and women are eligible to apply, and candidates should be outstanding students, technicians, journalists or teachers, and a potential "ambassador of goodwill" of high quality.

Awards are designed to promote understanding and friendly relations between peoples of different nations.

The club will accept applications from individuals whose legal residence is in Rotary District 789, or who are studying or working in this Rotary District.

District 789 includes Northern Connecticut and Western Massachusetts.

Applications may also be submitted to other Rotary Clubs in the area, but selection will be made on the basis of all applications from Rotary District 789.

Candidates should have a friendly, outgoing personality, a sympathetic interest in the attitudes and way of life of the people of a different culture, and the ability to communicate their ideas readily and effectively. Preference is given to applicants who wish to study in a country where the native language is different from their own, but must be able to read, write and speak the language of their proposed study country.

IMAGINE.
THE CHALLENGE AT TERADYNE.

Creating, manufacturing, and marketing the test systems that keep electronic technology growing is the business of Teradyne, the world's high-tech leader in automatic test equipment (ATE).

Every bit as sophisticated as the technology it must judge, ATE presents an especially exciting challenge to the most creative minds.

What keeps Teradyne in the forefront of this industry, and makes it such a rewarding place to work, is the fact that here creative minds are actively sought out and encouraged to sparkle.

The nature of our work demands it.

To imagine your future at Teradyne, check the Placement Office and talk to the Teradyne representative coming soon to your campus.

Off-campus housing - nice, but hard to find

By CHRISTOPHER H. SCHMITT
Collegian Staff

You can virtually forget moving off campus now, if you have any such ideas.

The housing noose, which has gradually been strangling the availability of decent off-campus rental units in past years, has taken an even tighter turn in past months, so that there is now almost a zero percent vacancy rate in surrounding apartments. The only way to find a place to live it seems is to know someone.

Students who want to move off-campus in a group with friends or other roomates will have no luck at all in finding a place to settle down.

The UMass Off-Campus Housing Office has been deluged this month with calls from people seeking places to live, reports Coordinator Joanne R. Levenson, who confirmed that a shortfall exists.

"There is space but it's overpriced," she said. "But what there is might not be adequate. That's why it's open."

Levenson reported the recent story of some students who came to the office looking for housing. They did not want to live in a dormitory, and when an off-campus residence could not be found, they withdrew from school rather than live on-campus.

A survey of major apartment complexes in the Amherst area revealed a bleak situation for those seeking to move off. Of five major areas -- Brandywine, Rolling Green, Southwood, and Brittany Manor; and Squire Village in Sunderland -- all reported no vacancies, and most already had waiting lists for any openings that might arise. Rents for two-bedroom apartments were reported to be starting at $275 and running on up to $370.

"I wish I had 1,000 more apartments," sighed Ann Cyr, manager of Squire Village, which one day recently turned away 12 groups of people seking apartments.

Rolling Green reported almost 100 people on its waiting list. Other complexes reported the same.

And if the dismal housing picture isn't enough, consider rents. It is expected that most areas will raise rents when new leases begin again this fall.

Sixth season opens for Performing Arts

The opening of the sixth spring semester of the UMass Performing Arts Division will feature three days of performances and inquiry sessions.

Beginning with the Open House Feb. 3 at the Department of Music in the Fine Arts Center, division faculty will meet with the public to informally answer questions about music, theater and dance. The sessions will begin at 2:00 pm.

At 3:00 pm in Bezanson Recital Hall, a "Showcase of Performances" will be presented by the division's music and dance faculty. The variety of performers has made the showcase a popular family concert experience.

Feb. 4 at 8:00 pm faculty of the Five-College Early Music program, associated with the Performing Arts Division, will present a Baroque music program. This unique introduction to the instruments of the Baroque period will be conducted by Thomas Kelly.

February 5 at 8:00 pm in Bezanson Recital Hall, Quadra Lyrica will present music for string quartet. Division faculty members Delores Kulikowski, violist, and Karen Wilson Sussman, cellist, will join violinists Giovina Sessions and Marsha Harbison, to present the music of Mozart, Mendelssohn and Ravel.

The three-day concert series is presented in conjunction with the Walk-In Registration of the Division: January 28-February 8. The division programs have over 70 faculty members offering one of the area's most comprehensive arts programs in music, theater and dance.

A complete program of music study, including group and private instruction in classical, popular, jazz and folk music is available to persons of all ages and all levels of ability. Students may select credit or non-credit study. Instruction is available in most subject areas on a year-round basis.

Dance offerings include ballet, modern, jazz and tap classes. A special supervised dance exercise class has been added to the Division's Spring offering.

Drama coursework is offered in cooperation with the Department of Theater. Division theater groups focus on basic acting skills and are held in sessions for children, young teens, and older teens through adults.

The Open House Inquiry Sessions and recitals are open to the public without charge. For complete information, anyone may visit the division office, located in Old Chapel between 10:00 am and 4 pm daily.

Amherst College to stage musical

The Amherst College Department of Dramatic Arts and the Masquers has announced that their second production of the academic year 1979-80 will be "Purlie," a musical comedy, to be performed Feb. 1 through 3 at 8 pm in the Kirby Theater.

Originally produced and directed for the Broadway stage by Phillip Rose, "Purlie" was written by Ossie Davis, Peter Udell and Phillip Rose with music by Gary Geld and lyrics by Peter Udell. It is based on the play "Purlie Victorious" by Ossie Davis.

The Masquers production will be directed by Walter Boughton. Musical direction is by Horace Boyer of the UMass Music Department; choreography is by Nancy Scattergood Jordan of the Daniel Lewis Dance Repertory Co., and scenery and costumes are designed by James Moran, newly appointed Assistant Professor of Design at Amherst College.

"Purlie" tickets are available at the Kirby Theater from 10am to 5pm weekdays. Admission is $2.50; senior citizens, $1.50.

Women's art planned for Women's Week

In honor of International Women's Week, the Student Union Gallery would like to exhibit original works of women staff members from Feb. 24 to March 1. Gallery members said they hope this will show the artistic diversity that exists within the University community.

Any personally created work (no kits) may be submitted. Participants should bring in a photo or description of the piece, and include the dimensions if possible, between Feb. 3 and 9. The gallery is located in room 115A, Student Union Building.

N'hampton bus route recently changed

The Pioneer Valley Transit Authority has announced bus service between Williamsburg and Northampton was rerouted from Massaoit Street to Elm Street in Northampton effective Jan.21.

December 28, 1979, the PVTA had changed the routing of Route 702 Williamsburg-Northampton, to operate via Massasoit Street instead of Prospect Street. This change was made due to the narrowness of some sections of Prospect Street in the vicinity of Smith College.

Residents along Massasoit Street complained about the change. As a result, Mayor David Musante requested that all trips on Route 702 be operated via N. Elm Street and Elm Street in Northampton.

Internship Office plans gathering

By ELLEN DAVIS
Collegian Staff

The Office of Internships has scheduled a "celebration" for UMass students who interned last semester, Feb. 7 from 4 p.m. to 6 p.m. in the Faculty Club. Faculty sponsors of interns are also invited.

Interns will have a chance to mingle and see what others did, Internship Coordinator Carol Stitt said. Interns are encouraged to bring samples of their work to the gathering, Stitt said.

"In the past we've had some really interesting exhibits," she said.

According to Stitt, 175 students did internships last semester, one of the highest totals ever for a fall semester. Of these, 47 were in Eastern Massachusetts, 88 were in Western Massachusetts, 30 were in Washington, four were in New York, and 27 were out-of-state or on Cape Cod.

Among the most popular internships last semester, Stitt said, were journalism and communications.

For students considering internships for this summer or next fall, the office also has a number of activities planned this semester.

During the week of March 3, the office will be sponsoring an "Agency Fair," where students can meet professional people with whom they may be interested in interning.

Over 300 agencies from Western Massachusetts have been invited to the fair, Stitt said.

Feb. 20 and 21, the Office will be holding large introductory meetings for prospective interns. The 7 p.m. meetings will be held in Campus Center room 163.

In addition, at least one introductory meeting will be held in the Internship Office each day through April 25. April 25 is the latest students should start looking for internships for summer and fall, Stitt said.

Students interested in internships for summer or fall should come to the office preferably by the end of February, Stitt said.

It usually takes 4-6 weeks to search for internships, apply, have interviews, and get a faculty sponsor," she said. "It's easier if all this is done before pre-registration."

The Office of Internships is located in room 16 of the Curry Hicks Building.. For interns attending the celebration Feb 7.

★ Legislature

The legislature in the past has made such decisions without the necessary knowledge or coordination of any long-range planning, according to the commission.

The commission further seeks to reform the state's selection and bidding procedure, which it uses to select private designers and contractors, the report states. The aims of this reform are selection of the best qualified firms and lessening of political influence in contract awards. The commission hopes to accomplish both by placing more responsibility on the state Designer Selection Board and on the individual designers and contractors themselves.

The state low bid system was also recommended for reform by screening those contractors who have performed poorly in previous state work. The past system required, with rare exception, a mandatory contract award to the lowest bidder regardless of any consideration of the contractor's quality.

The formation of this new division represents an entire restructuring of the state organization for managing and maintaining of all public construction.

The commission also calls for the establishment of an office of an Inspector General to "detect and deter fraud, waste and abuse in state funded programs," according to the report.

The commission was mandated two years ago by the Legislature to "investigate corruption and maladministration in the construction of state and county buildings" and to make recommendations for reform and improvement in that construction prcss, the report states.

The commission found the management of state public construction "confused, inefficient, wasteful of tax dollars, susceptible to influence, and cannot guarantee the quality of work which we all, as citizens and taxpayers, pay for."

Ken Mosakowski and Evan Johnston of The Student Center for Educational Research and Advocacy think there will be stiff opposition to the legislation now in proposal form. Mosakowski, SCERA legislative research director, said, "The key is to reach all members of key committees" involved in the bill-making process. Though many members of the legislature are up for reelection this year, the governor is not.

The governor can line veto anything he wants," Mosakowski said. This veto would entail leaving out any line or small portion of the bill possibly changing the meaning or scope of the bill, he said.

Engineers at Xerox work miracles.

Our engineers convert complicated tasks into simple ones. With just the push of a button, Xerox equipment works wonders. Dependably. Our engineers' reward? Success. And Xerox technology is built on success stories.

Xerox is dedicated to new ideas. And to our engineers who are developing them. While our competition cut their R&D budgets, we increased ours. (By 15%). Engineers at Xerox work with almost $1 million a day converting the technology of the future into reality. Our challenge of the 80's. Not everyone is ready for it. Xerox is. And we're looking for engineers who want to be part of it. Your future can get off to a great start in our reprographics technology. But did you know that Xerox is also a leader in processor memory discs and drives, electronic typing and printing and telecommunications?

Xerox is a total information center.

Cows may moo when milked

Chocolate or vanilla, one or the udder

By JACK GALLAGHER
Collegian Staff

SOUTH DEERFIELD – The building off River Road, in the shadow of Mt. Sugarloaf, looked auspicious in the January sunlight.

Seventy-two Holstein cows munched on hay in the 28-degree heat as a visitor approached; but they paid no notice. They would be milked an hour later, it was learned later that Thursday afternoon.

In a few weeks, some UMass students will begin a research project with part of the milk herd. They will incorporate soy residue, which will come from the New England Soy Dairy in Greenfield, into the Holstein's feed.

Then they will check the milk and see what happens. The cows might not even eat the feed. They will see what, if anything, happens.

Inside the building that looked like the new wing of a schoolhouse, four men were playing cards, a game of pitch. They played because they work on cow cycles: You can't milk a cow when it doesn't want to be milked. And one of the men playing was C.B. Elwell of Greenfield.

Elwell, 36, runs the UMass Dairy Facility, where four men work with him and they all work with animals: Holsteins, Herefords, sheep.

They work for the University of Massachusetts, the state, and they work for the Department of Veterinary and Animal Science.

Other people work there, too: students from the department, professors and farm workers. There are 250 acres of state-owned land around the buildings on River Road.

Corn and hay are grown so that the operation is self-sufficient. The corn is used for grain which goes into the mixture that the cows eat. Other things thrown in that the cows eat, along with the corn, are: brewer's grain, urea, soybean, minerals and pre-mixed vitamins. The mixture is concocted in the buiding.

Charles Rogers, a 24-year UMass dairy farm veteran, feeds some of the younger cows at the Deerfield farm. The cows are to be part of a new research project at the facility. (Staff photo by Jim Mahoney)

Elwell said this after the others had left to go into some of the other wings of the building. He had a computer printout sheet in his hand, and he read figures from it.

There are 72 female cows at the facility that produce milk, 75 younger Holsteins, 20 beef cows and some sheep.

The 72 Holsteins produce about 6,200 lbs. of milk every other day, which is fairly competitive compared to a private herd of the same size. Each one of the 72 gives about 15,500 lbs. of milk per year.

That milk goes for anywhere from $11 to $13 per hundredweight, Elwell said. And Daylight Dairy of Chicopee buys about 100,000 lbs. of milk from the facility, a commercial dairy worker said.

Some of the steer are used by the UMass Food Tech Department, and the rest are sold at auction in Whately, at the farmers cooperative. Some of the lambs are sold, too.

Elwell said steer used to be sold for between $200 and $300, but that they sell for more now. But the price depends on the quality of the steer, too.

But money doesn't mean much at the facility.

Othe research projects at the dairy include working with fistulated cows which means there is a hole in their stomach—about the size of a softball—that lets researchers take food out of the cows' stomachs and analyze it.

Research is the reason why the corn that is grown on the property has to be used to feed the cattle: If the feed mixture is to be changed, no commercial feed dealer would do it because it wouldn't be profitable for him.

"If I was trying to make money off the herd, I wouldn't think of mixing my own grain," Elwell said. But the state owns the property.

This story, which originally appeared in the Greenfield Recorder has been reprinted with that newspaper's permission.

'Spaceman' to join DVP starting line-up

By FRAN BASCHE
Collegian Staff

Bill Lee, southpaw pitcher for the Montreal Expos, is in the starting line-up for the Distinuished Visitors Program this semester.

Lee is scheduled to appear at 8 p.m. Feb. 6 in the Fine Arts Center Auditorium, free to UMass students only.

At press time negotiations were still underway to contract Andrew Young, former U.S. ambassador to the United Nations as a speaker. Joel Weissman, who chairs the 22-member program, said Young was asking $5,000 for an appearance. Young would appear in the Curry Hicks Cage in late February and UMass students would probably be charged about $2 for the event to cover the costs of the program. A change in the group's constitution now allows admission fees, something Weissman said would be done "sparingly."

DVP, formed in 1959 operates this year with a $26,000 budget, half of which has already been spent, Weissman said.

Other plans for the semester include musician Gil Scott-Heron and political activist Paul Robeson Jr. during Martin Luther King Jr. week in March. These arrangements have not been finalized yet.

DVP is hoping to sign author and political activist Barry Commoner as part of an anti-nuclear conference being sponsored by the UMass chapter of Student Coalition Against Nukes Nationwide.

DVP will also be aiding the International Women's Week steering committee in lining up speakers for the week, scheduled for March 3 through 8. Historian Barbara Wertheimer, author of We Were There, is one of several speakers being considered.

Weissman said DVP is attempting to get as many presidential candidates as possible to speak. Although many of them have been unrepsonive as yet, Weissman said when the Massachusetts and New Hampshire state primaries begin, the situation will probably change.

Weissman said the group is applying for some endowment funds from the University, which is $60,000 worth of accumulated interest on a $100,000 University Trust Fund to pay for additional programs.

Flutist Jean-Pierre Rampal opens the FAC concert series tonight at 8 p.m. Tickets can still be purchased at the FAC box office.

Rampal opens tonight

Diverse shows set for FAC

By TOM ANDERSON
Collegian Staff

Today marks the start of a new semester at UMass and the beginning of the Fine Arts Center's as well. As in past years, the FAC will bring to campus a wide range of music, drama, and dance.

The concert series begins tonight at 8, as the world-renowned flutist Jean-Pierre Rampal performs with pianist and harpsichordist John Steele Ritter. At press time good seats were still available from the FAC Box Office. Tonight's program will include works of Bach, Telemann and Franck.

Feb. 7 pianist Ruth Laredo will perform at the FAC with Frankfurt Radio Symphony on their first American tour. Ms. Laredo, currently on tour in Europe, has played with almost every major American orchestra, including the Boston Symphony and New York Philharmonic. She holds the distiction as being the first pianist named "artist in residence" at West Point Military Academy.

Feb. 9, the sounds of classical music will agian resound throughout the concert hall. Violinist Pinchas Zukerman will appear with pianist Marc Neikrug. Zukerman, who has played with and conducted numerous well-known orchestras, is widely regarded as one of the world's finest masters of the violin.

March 28, the Guarneri String Quartet from New York will appear.

The last scheduled classical concert of the season will be on April 16 at the FAC. Another highly-regarded violinist, Itzhak Perlman, will join the Springfield Symphonyin the Wednesday evening performance.

In addition to the classical concerts, the FAC will present Max Roach's M'Boom Re: Percussion March 7. The six-man group will give an all-percussion performance.

Three dance programs are scheduled for this spring. The Alvin Ailey American Dance Theatre comes to Amherst for a three-night visit February 12, 13, and 14. The troupe will perform "Suite Otis," based on six songs by Otis Redding, and several original pieces.

The National Dance Company of Sengal is scheduled to perform at the FAC February 17.

The Royal Winnipeg Ballet performs February 19. This Canadian company has received enthusiastic reviews for its performances throughout the United States. Finally, the Royal Dancers of Bhutan are scheduled to perform March *11 in Bowker Auditorium.

In the past, the FAC has brought in touring companies for hit musicals, and this season is no exception. "Eubie!," the tribute to the 96-year-old composer Eubie Blake, is scheduled for a Feb. 22 appearance. The show includes many of the songs that made Blake famous, including "I'm Just Wild About Harry" and "Charleston Rag."

In addition, the old Jerome Kern/Oscar Hammerstein II favorite "Showboat" will be performed on April 12. Leading roles will be played by Forrest Tucker and Butterfly McQueen, of Gone With the Wind fame.

The following night offers a dramatic change of pace, when the hit comedy chiller "Deathtrap" comes to the FAC. The play was written by Ira Levin, best known for Rosemary's Baby.

Music, dance and theater will all be combined March 29 at the FAC by Jury's Irish Cabaret on Dublin. A company of 30 singers, dancers, musicians and storytellers combine their talents for a colorful salute to Irish folk and popular culture.

One consistently popular performer will return to UMass this spring. Mime Marcel Marceau will bring his silent magic here on March 5.

In addition to these FAC events two Concerts for Young People will be presented with afternoon shows open to the general public. "Freedom Train" March 17 and "Young Tom Edison & the Magic Why" April 2 are scheduled.

FAC Publicity Manager Monica Faulkner said special efforts are underway to increase student participation in the series, including additional discounts which will decrease the price of student tickets to one-half the regular cost. These special discounts, subsidized by the UMass Arts Council, will be in effect for all February performances. The only exception to the half-price student discounts is the performance of flutist Rampal, when the Arts Council subsidy will cover about one-third the cost, cutting three dollars from the student admission prices. Unless otherwise specified, all performances are at 8 p.m. in the FAC Concert Hall.

Garcia, Kinks, others slated for semester

By ED LEVINE
Collegian Staff

Jerry Garcia, Taj Mahal, Pat Metheney and the Kinks will headline an exciting series of UMass concerts this semester.

UMass graduate Taj Mahal will appear in the Student Union Ballroom Feb. 14. A veteran performer, he first appeared in 1965 with guitarist Ry Cooder in a group called the Rising Sons. That same year he went solo and released his first album, Taj Mahal.

Twelve more albums followed, as well as an appearance at the Woodstock festival in 1969. His music is based on Blues, and more recently has shown influences from Carribean and West African music.

Tickets for the concert will go on sale today at Tix in the Student Union, Union Records Unlimited, and Platterpus Records in Northampton. Union Program COunci spokesperson Darlene Lorkiewicz said last week the tickets will cost $4 for students, and $5 for non-students.

Jerry Garcia, popular Grateful Dead guitarist will perform with his solo band Feb. 20 in the Fine Arts Center Concert Hall. While final details have yet to be announced, Lorkiewicz said tickets for the concert are scheduled to go on sale next week.

Jazz guitarist Pat Metheney will appear in the FAC Concert Hall Feb. 24. Tickets for the show are expected to go on sale Feb. 7.

The Kinks, a long-time favorite of rock fans, will return to UMass on March 6. Tickets for the concert, to be held in the FAC Concert Hall, are scheduled to go on sale Feb. 18.

Final sale dates and ticket prices will be announced shortly, Lorkiewicz said.

Winning records

In our Arts section, a special two-page feature examines the "Legacy of Rock" in the 1970's, which includes the choices of seven critics for the Top 20 Albums of the decade. Edited by Jim Moran, contributing writers include: Perry Adler, Tom Anderson, Ed Levine, Brett Milano, Steve Winniman and Andrew Woolf.

Also highlighted are previews of the coming semeser at the Fine Arts Center, Performing Arts Division and University Gallery. And staff writer Ed Levine tells us what the Union Program Council is planning in the way of concerts for this spring.

Losing basketball

The Minutemen played impecably bad basketball during intersession, and remained mired in the longest losing streak in the school's basketball history. Dating back to last season, UMass has lost 25 in a row at press time, including the last 13 games last season.

As awesome as that streak may seem, it is still short of both the New England and national records. Dartmouth lost 34 games in a row from 1916-20, and The Citadel dropped 37 consecutive contests in 1954-55. But hang in there. The Minutemen have 14 games remaining this season, and could set a new standard by which ineptitude is measured. See page 36.

FAC Gallery to feature sculpture, prints

By EILEEN M. FOLEY
Collegian Staff

Environment, natural and fabricated, is the dominant concept in two exhibitions which will open the spring semester at the University Gallery. Log Mass: Mass Curve, a sculptural installation by George Trakas, and Contemporary Prints from Northern California, culled from the works of 15 artists, will run through March 14 in the gallery, located in the UMass Fine Arts Center.

Trakas has been at work since December cutting and placing massive pine logs, welding and bolting steel girders to form the slowly ascending bridge which will sweep around the main gallery. The installation will also incorporate a staircase and a number of platforms placed at a variety of heights and angles, as well as architectural elements of the gallery itself into the over-all scheme.

Bodies in space

The interplay of the spectator and the surrounding environment, the contrast between the natural wood and the industrially fabricated steel elelments of that environment are the concepts at the core of Trakas's work. The spectators' perception of the work shifts as individual's body circulates through the space which the work defines, as the proportions between the two change.

Trakas sees the participant in his sculptures as "a thinking being that uses the senses for self-realization;" Log Mass: Mass Curve affords an opportunity for the Amherst area to participate in this internationally known environmental sculptor's first solo exhibition in New England. Working drawings of the installation will be on view in the gallery, and in addition, Trakas will lecture on his work on Tuesday, February 26, at 8 pm in Herter 231 on campus.

The Contemporary Prints from Nothern California exhibition will feature lithographs, etchings, serigraphs and monotypes dating from the 1960's to the present. These prints are the works of artists who attended at least one of the many art schools in Northern California, and who have spent the majority of their careers there.

Physical environment

Richard Diebenkorn was one of a number of artists centered around the San Francisco Art Institute who evolved a new school of figurative painting during the late 40's and 50's, bespeaking an awareness of the natural, physical environment distinctly at odds with the New York inspired Abstract Expressionism which dominated the San Francisco Bay area. Diebenkorn's contributions to the exhibition illustrate his logical progression from geomentric figural, still-life

Birthday party or funeral?

30 years of rockin' and rollin'

By ANDREW WOOLF
Special to the Collegian

Rock n' Roll, 1950 to 1980. Sounds impressive, doesn't it? Trouble is, I can't decide if we've got a birthday party, or a funeral on our hands. At the close of rock's third decade, things appear to be either in a state of transition, or utter chaos, depending upon how cynical one's viewpoint.

In Britain, punk rock, unlike Sid Vicious, lives on, despite having been cast off as de rigeur by American audiences. Stateside, punk seems to have gained acceptance more as this year's fashion item, than as any kind of musicological statement. Understandable perhaps, considering the vast cross-cultural gap that tends to estrange Amerian and British audiences.

The latter are taking the opportunity of Rock's 30th year to relive some of their own finest moments. 1979 was the year of the rock n' roll revival in Britain—the year Mods motor-scootered in from the mid-sixties to reclaim "their generation" with a healthy dose of Rhythm & Blues. Oddly enough, the neo-Mod bands don't sound at all dated; perhaps, by thumbing their noses at the next decade, they have paradoxically become part of it.

Other gems uncovered during the great pop excavation of '79 include a cadre of reggae bands based on the Skatalite and Rock Steady sounds of the early sixties. The resurrected Ska-beat groups are painstaking tributes sprung from British "Skinhead" and "Rude Boy" sub-cultures, whose primarily white members have always revered the original Jamaican bands. Debut albums from "Rude Boy" bands, Madness and the Specials are even getting significant attention on the American charts.

The British music scene currently resembles nothing if not a giant smorgasbord of genres, each with it own legion of hard core followers. At the annual three-day Reading Festival in London last summer, punks, Mods, Rude Boys, New Wavers, even hippies turned up to support their representative bands and, well, at least tolerate each other.

With the British busy throwing in everything but the kitchen sink, the American music scene, by comparison, seems rather sparse. The problem concerns, I think, sluggishness and conservatism on the part of the music industry, rather than any actual lack of talent in this country. Because of the heavy investment involved, major labels here tend to prefer breaking a few groups a year that will sell, rather than risk capital promoting anything innovative or unusual.

Fortunately, alternative labels are cropping up that deal with some of the more unusual groups, such as San Francisco based Ralph Records, who roster includes The Residents, Tuxedomoon and an English band, The Art Bears.

Hopefully, Rock's next decade will see a proliferation of innovative music from America, which will receive the kind of widespread support Britsh bands enjoy at home. 1979 has been an unpredictable, stormy, occasionally disappointing, but ultimately satisfying year for rock n' roll. I for one am eagerly anticipating the next ten years...

Avante garde films offered at FAC Gallery

By EILEEN M. FOLEY
Collegian Staff

This year the University Gallery will expand its offerings with the addition of a film series, featuring avante garde shorts by a variety of primarily American filmmakers.

Films will be screened on Tuesday evenings at 8 pm in Herter Hall 231. The series opens Feb. 5 with films by California Artists, including "The Great Blondino" by Robert Nelson and William Wiley. This 1967 work uses tightrope walker Harry Blondino as metaphor for modern man. On the same bill is Bruce Nauman's "Thighing," which presents the human body as its field of activity.

Other screening dates are Feb. 19, March 4, March 25, and May 15. The entire schedule looks to be uniformly superb. This series is guaranteed to titilate the growing cult of cinema addicts lurking in the Amherst area, and is bound to engage even the most casual dabblers in the avant garde of any media.

Watch the Collegian's weekly Arts/Entertainment calendar for further details, or contact the University Gallery, located in the Fine Arts Center.

The extreme of this trend is discernable in the particularly West Coast brand of Photorealism evident in the works by Bechtle, McLean and Torklason, also included in this exhibition.

The Top 20 albums of the decade

The legacy of rock

The decade of the 1970's was important in terms of contemporary music. Starting with the break-ups of the Beatles; Peter, Paul and Mary; and Simon and Garfunkel, and ending with the refocusing of popular tastes in music ranging from disco to power pop to reggae, the 1970's was a period of musical reaction and interaction.

Early in the decade, we saw the abundance of easy-listening and soft-rock styles in such performers as the Eagles, Carly Simon, Cat Stevens and James Taylor. Rock had become so mellow that one could find Mom and Dad able to listen to and appreciate their kids' music—a direct blow to the heritage of rock as a more meaningful, often offensive, audibly-violent challenge to the status quo.

In response to this drift, we saw the emergence of glitter rock, with such luminaries as David Bowie, Alice Cooper and T. Rex taking center stage. We saw new faces utilizing more traditional styles, such as Jackson Browne, Billy Joel, Elton John and Bruce Springsteen.

Then, as if to throw us off the track again, disco became the prominent point' de contender in sounds being emitted from our radios and quadrophonic systems. In fact, with some, it became a lifestyle. The reaction to this "new" music (actually a composite of jazz, bass-emphasized rock and soul before the Bee Gees ruined it) was the most violent. Claiming that disco was pure hedonism, devoid of intelligent lyrics and musically-invariable, rock purists turned to the sounds of punk and new wave. The differences between these latter two seem unclear, except to say that both drew upon existentialism, politics and back-to-basics guitar riffs as their chief influences.

Such artists as the Clash, Elvis Costello, the Ramones, the Sex Pistols, Patti Smith, Talking Heads and Television were the modern-day torchbearers for such precursors of new dimension rock as Iggy and the Stooges, the MC5, the New York Dolls and the Velvet Underground. Yet there was an apparent em- phasis on artistry and uniqueness that had been theretofor unwitnessed.

Once the novelty of the safety-pin earrings and ripped clothes wore off, the sounds of new wave permeated the mainstream, leaving its elitist followers with a mixed feeling of delight and astonishment at the transformatin into power-pop and disco-infused styles gaining airplay. People began to rethink their musical tastes. Rock devotees accepted the classier disco styles of Donna Summer, M and Sister Sledge. Disco-lovers took to Blondie, the B-52s and Talk- ing Heads, giving such performers a mass consumption status.

With this flurry of activity in the newer music styles, blues, classical, folk, jazz, reggae and soul continued to enjoy modest audience appeal. More tradi tional artists such as Bob Dylan, Arlo Guthrie, B.B. King, Bob Marley, Joni Mitchell, Al Green, Dave Brubeck and Muddy Waters survived. The Grateful Dead, the Rolling Stones and the Who fared well against the onslaught of new musical forces. New faces, such as Joan Armatrading, George Benson and Jean Luc-Ponty made their contributions as well. Progressive rock, in the forms of Genesis, Roxy Music, 10cc and Yes captured attention. And we continue to see the exploiters in the field, with such performers as Aerosmith, Ted Nugent, Kiss and the VillagePeople making their grabs for the bubblegum set.

'Needless to say, a lot happened with music in the 1970's. It was contrary to popularly-espoused philosophy, a much more active, diverse and experimental period for music than in the 60's.'

Needless to say, a lot happened with music in the 1970's. It was, contrary to popularly-espoused philosophy, a much more active, diverse and experimen tal period for music than the 1960's. Disco may have sucked, but it did serve at least one purpose, in that it got people off their derriers to produce some very fine music.

What follows are lists of Top 20 albums of the decade, compiled by seven writers who have, in one way or another, been involved with the crtical study of music in their respective roles on this campus during the latter part of the 1970's. It would be inaccurate to suggest that any one factor influenced their deci sions. Generally, however, what led to these decisions were the following pertinent factors: 1) Did the artist make some significant contribution to the field of music?, 2)has the artist shown a sense of innovation or progression within the context of their own career?, 3)to some extent, was the artist popular?, 4) has the artist shown the ability to draw upon other musical forces as influences or has the artist been an influential force to others in the field?, 5) does the artist produce enjoyable music (danceable, lyrically-developed, melodic, well-produced)?

In summation though, one cannot deny that the processes of elimination which led to these difficult decisions had to be influenced by the factor of per sonal bias. Readers may not agree with some of them, or none of them, but they are the opinions of the respective writers. Read them, enjoy the nostalgia for what it's worth, argue about it and make up your own lists! —Edited by Jim Moran

Where there's snow...

By ANTONY KUNDERT and STEVE SEGAL

The lack of natural snow has not stopped the UMass ski team from practicing this winter. Berkshire East in Charlemont has been able to make enough artificial snow to keep up with the men's and women's team's rigorous training schedule.

Training began during finals week and is continuing through January. The first week after Christmas, conditions were marginal and skiers were forced to hike up a small patch of artificial snow. By the second week of training, enough snow was made to open the lifts.

The typical day for a UMass racer starts out with a 45-minute drive to Berkshire East. Skiers are on the snow by 9a.m. and a half hour later a course is set for training. There is a short mid-day lunch break, then a new course is set and training resumes for the rest of the afternoon.

The UMass practice consists of alternating days of slalom and giant slalom. A slalom course is set so the skier must make quick, short radius turns, and giant slalom is a much faster race with long radius turns.

Early competition included an international invitational ski race Jan. 5 and 6 at the site of the Olympic Games in Lake Placid, N.Y. Five team members were picked from the 17 man comtingent to represent the tri-state region. The slalom was set on a steep and icy slope on which out of a hundred and twenty starters only thirty finished.

The races turned out to be a disaster for two UMass racers. Brian Prindle and Pat Downes, who were injured. Prindle, a top skier for the University this year, suffered a broken ankle which will put him out for the season. Downes injured his back but will recover shortly.

Another pre-season race was held Jan. 11 at Berkshire East. This race consisted of a giant slalom in the morning and a slalom in the afternoon. The men's team competed as a guest on training day. The women's team foreran each run in order to obtain early season race experience. The men's team placed six out of seven racers in the top 10 in both events. Kevin Nolan, co-captain of the men's team, swept the field, winning the giant slalom by a large margin. In the slalom the best UMass competitor was Chris Wakefield, who finished second.

UM sticker in Games?

UMass sophomore Judy Strong, who led the field hockey team to fourth place nationally this past season, has been named to the United States Elite team.

Some of the 22-member squad, chosen by Olympic team coaches, will be selected for the Olympic team. The situation, however, is nebulous now since women's field hockey has not been an Olympic sport before.

UMass field hockey coach Pam Hixon said the Elite team is a "step" toward being chosen for the Olympic team, to be chosen at the beginning of February.

Strong, a Hatfield native, led the team with 24 goals and 10 assists in 24 games, as the team finished 19-4-1. Last summer, she played on the United States team with teammate Laura O'Neil. That team is a notch below the Elite team.

Cross-country skiing has its ups, downs

By STEVE WESTRA
Collegian Staff

Cross-Country skiing can be beautiful for its natural simplicity, or, it can be excitingly competitive. The facilities for both types of skiing exist in Amherst.

The Mill River Conservation Area in North Amherst, one of many conservation areas open to public skiing, will be the sight of a one-kilometer training loop. The loop will be two tracks and will be maintained by the Amherst Nordic Ski Club and the Amherst Recreation Department.

The loop will be open to any skiier from novice to expert and will be illuminated for night skiing until 9 p.m. For those turned off by the tedium of going around a track, the rest of the Mill River Area will be open for off-track skiing.

The ski club and the recreation department also will offer lessons by qualified club members. The lessons will include waxing and maintaining skiis, correcting technique and proper ski dressing. The classes are divided by ability, and there is a charge for each session.

Tours will also be conducted by the club, including trips to the summit of Mt. Worwottuck on the Holyoke Range.

If equipment is needed, local sports stores or the UMass Outing Club offer a variety of goods. At UMass fine equipment at reasonable costs can be found.

If you have equipment, don't need lessons and just want to go off by yourself there is plenty of opportunity to do so.

Local trails include eight different ski areas with miles of unbroken trails and beauty. These areas are as near to town as Amherst College Wildlife Sanctuary, or Fort River Conservation Area, off South Pleasant Street.

Other areas for skiing include Mt. Castor Marsh Conservatin Area located off Southeast Street. Mt. Castor Marsh is a mixture of woods, marsh and old fields.

Also off Southeast Street is the Lawrence Swamp Conservation Area. This area is 800 acres of forest, marshland and streams.

For good cross-country skiing of any sort the Amherst Conservation Areas are a sure bet. Or, for those with enough good fortune or imagination, the best cross-country skiing can be as near as the back yard.

Cagers still seeking elusive first victory

By JIM DEGNIM
Collegian Staff

To answer your question, no, the UMass men's basketball team still hasn't won any games at press time.

Over intersession, the team continued its descent into that dark abyss which has become the longest losing in the school's history.

The Minutemen dropped all of their games during intersession and at presstime, were still mired in "The Streak," a string of 27 consecutive losses over the past seasons.

While you were away, UMass dropped seven games, six of them by ten points or more, the piece de resistance being a 92-59 loss at Villanova.

There was a temporary glimmer of hope in a 76-70 loss to Rutgers Jan. 5. The team played well and had a chance to win the game. But when things are going badly, wins just don't show up.

At presstime, the most recent loss was to Athletes-in-Action, a collection of basketball-playing evangelists which boasts players such as former UCLA player Ralph Drollinger and Arkansas' Marvin Delph.

Duquense, one of the stronger teams in the Eastern Eight, defeated the Minutemen Jan. 21, 88-66. Two days earlier, George Washington University defeated UMass, 75-64. The Colonials are generally regarded as one of the weaker teams in the Eastern Eight. Coach Ray Wilson travelled to his alma mater, Boston University, Jan. 15. The first-year coach, who can hardly be faulted for his team's bad fortunes, suffered a 78-51 loss at the hands of BU Coach Rick Pitino, a 1974 UMass graduate.

The UConn Huskies defeated UMass Jan. 12, 72-51, at the Springfield Civic Center in a game that would make Dr. Naismith deny any association with the sport. The highlight of the game was a rebound by UConn's Al Lewis, a 6'11" senior whose playing time is inversely proportional to his height.

A UMass player was at the foul line for two shots late in the game. When the first shot came off the rim, Lewis skiied for the rebound, caught the ball in his right hand, and slapped against his left hand very hard, causing a loud pop. As he landed in the lane, he turned around to find all the other players standing still. The crowd razzed Lewis for his error and he sheepishly handed the ball to the referee for the second shot.

The Minutemen began intersession Jan.2, with a 78-68 loss to Providence College, a mediocre team. UMass freshman guard Ty Nedd made his debut against the Friars, and quickly emerged as the finest player on the team.

A 6'3" Clairton, Penn. native, Nedd missed the team's first seven games with a broken hand suffered during a preseason workout. In his first game, he scored 10 points. In his next outing, a loss to Rutgers, he had 17 points and six rebounds. Nedd is currently averaging 13.1 points a game and is the only UMass player to score in double figures for every game he's played.

Nedd has assumed the point guard position for the Minutemen, a spot where the team sorely needs help.

In an unrelated development, guards Marc Roberts and David Teague were dropped from the team for "personal reasons," according to Wilson.

Despite the bleak situation, Wilson says, "These kids haven't given up yet."

As bad as The Streak may seem, it is still short of both the New England and national records. Dartmouth lost 34 in a row from 1916 to 1920, and The Citadel dropped 37 straight in 1954-55.

Beaulieu and Walls shine for struggling trackmen

By JANE WOLFSON
Collegian Staff

Outstanding performances by sophomore Paul Beaulieu in the mile and senior Rick Walls in the two mile run were not enough to offset the inevitable as the UMass men's indoor track team suffered two more setbacks at the hands of the Huskies of Northeastern and the Boston University Terriers. The final scores: NU 72; BU 69; UMass 31. It was the Minutemen's lone trimeet over intersession.

"Boston University was the New England champion last year and Northeastern always has an exceptional program," explained UMass Coach Ken O'Brien.

"Our team performance was a far far distance from theirs. They are the two strongest teams in New England."

The Minutemen looked strongest in the distance events. Beaulieu won the mile race with a time of 4:08.9, the fastest time in New England for this season. Beaulieu missed the school record held by All-American Randy Thomas by seven tenths of a second. Tri-captain Steve MacDougall placed second with the time of 4:10.1, also his fastest time of the season.

In the two mile race Walls won with a time of 9:00.4, the third fastest time in New England this season. Placing second was freshman Rick Doiron at 9:13.6. Finishing fourth was junior Mike Doiron. His time was 9:21.

Other strong performances for the Minutemen included a second place finish for senior pole vaulter Jim Larabee who vaulted 13 feet despite a thigh injury and a 6.4 performance for sophomore Bill DeVarney in the 60-yard dash. This was his fourth consecutive performance of 6.4 and has run consistently well all season according to O'Brien.

Senior Rick Cady finished third in the 400 meter run with a time of 49.6.

Also placing for the Minutemen was returning tri-captain Mickey Baugh who spent last semester at UPenn, finished fourth in the 800 at 1:57.5.

"It's during intersession and the performances were very good and everybody ran their best times, when you look at our competition there's definitely been a progression made," said tri-captain junior Rick Trunfio.

Other track meets over intersession included the United States Track and Field Federation meet held at Dartmouth the weekend of January 11-13. This included a very wide range of competitors from the college and high school levels along with track clubs. UMass finished in a tie for second in the four mile relay at 17:07.4. Running that relay were Beaulieu, Walls, MacDougall, and senior Bob Martin.

Hoopwomen win three drop five over break

By DANNY GUIDERA
Collegian Staff

January has not been very kind to the UMass women's basketball squad, who took a 4-1 record into the break between semesters only to see it go to 7-6 as they dropped five of the eight games. However, at this writing the Minutewomen still remain rated number one in the New England Coaches' Poll.

"We struggled a couple of times," said Minutewomen coach Mary Ann Ozdarski, midway throygh interssion, "but that happens to any basketball team." She added that her team was further ahead of where she expected the team be, especially with such a young squad.

The Minutewomen opened the new year by losing here to St. John's 77-66 at the Curry Hicks Cage. Although UMass fell behind progressively in the game, the Minutewomen rallied back to cut the deficit to three late in the game. St. Johns was not to be had, though, and stormed back to ice the game by the large spread. The game marked a milestone for Minutewomen guard Sue Peters as the senior hit for her 1504th career point early in the second half to pass Mike Pyatt as the all-time leading scorer in the history of UMass basketball.

Three days later the Minutewomen travelled to New Jersey and got back on the winning track by downing William Patterson College in a high-scoring affair, 91-81. Center Julie Ready led UMass scorers with 23 points.

On January 12th the Minutewomen were to begin a three-game losing streak that saw them fall on two last-second free throws to nationally rated Montclair State College, 62-59, at the Springfield Civic Center.

UMass lost to eastern power Queens College four nights later 74-70 in a game played at Queens. Things did not get better as the Minutewomen travelled upstate to the Syracuse University Invitational women basketball tournament where they lost in the opening round to underdog Syracuse 73-72 after leading by as much as nine in the second half.

Frustrating was the fact that the Minutewomen had dropped these three games by a cumulative total of eight points.

The Minutewomen got back on the track momentarily by defeating the WRams of the University of Rhode Island (previously ranked second in New England) 75-66. Peters, who hit for 29 points in the victory over Rhode Island was named to the all-tournament team.

On Jan. 21 the Minutewomen were trounced by the Wildcats of the University of New Hampshire 76-61 at Durham. The game was bad news on two fronts in the fact that the Minutewomen, who have already been plagued with injuries throughout the season, lost the services of guard Sherry Collins for a few games when she injured her back diving for a loose ball.

Last Wednesday the Minutewomen returned to their winning ways by defeating New England rival the University of Connecticut 87-78 at the Springfield Civic Center as Peters hit for 26 points.

Draft protesters were at it for the first in almost ten years last Friday as about 100 people gathered at the town common to rally against Pres. Carter's recent draft registration proposal. (Staff Photo by Jim Mahoney)

Students rally to oppose draft

By ED LEVINE

Cries of protest have sprung up in the Five College area in the past week in response to President Carter's call for selective service registration.

Last Friday about 100 students rallied in Amherst center in protest of a possible draft. The protest was organized by an informal group of students from Amherst and Hampshire Colleges and UMass who said they would rally again.

The rally is scheduled to begin at 12 noon at the UMass campus pond and the protesters will march to Amherst center, said James Haug, of the Student Center for Educational Research and Advocacy. Haug is also coordinating the formation of Students Against the Draft, an ad-hoc group of UMass students formed to fight draft registration.

"We want to push for other alternatives to solving our problems other than military pressure," Haug said. "We are trying to form a Five College coalition which will connect with other groups nationwide."

Haug said SAD is planning to circulate a petition on campus urging lawmakers to seek alternatives to the draft. He also said the group will furnish students with information on how to apply for consciencious objector stetus.

Student Government Association Co-President Rich LaVoice said SAD will attempt to enlist the support of faculty groups, labor unions, social service agencies and other organizations.

"We have to get large groups of people to understand our position," LaVoice said.

Protesters participating in last Friday's rally also called for alternatives to draft registration.

"We are opposed to registration because it would lead to the draft," said Thomas Stoner, a Hampshire College student.

"None of us want to go to war. We want to see the process abandoned," he said.

Joel Berkovitz, a Hampshire College freshman said the United States should seek an alternative to military action.

"We want to use diplomacy," Berkovitz said. "We didn't give detente a fair chance."

Stoner said nearly 500 signatures had been collected on a petition which would be sent to Washington. He said the petition will call for the nation to abandon plans for the draft.

Poll reveals UMass students favor draft

By BRIAN O'CONNELL
Collegian Staff

Students are in favor of President Carter's call for reinstatement of Selective Service registration, according to an informal survey conducted by the Collegian yesterday.

The majority of the students questioned said they would register for the draft, and many said they would be willing to participate in a military conflict if asked by Congress to do so. Two students, however, were wary of allowing women to be included in the fighting.

President Carter last Wednesday ordered the government start the process of registration—that is, to have young men identify themselves to Selective Service and keep them informed of their addresses. The president has not ordered a reinstatement of the draft, but wants to resume the draft registration in order to speed up the drafting process if needed. The President does not have the legal authority to register women. This action would require Congressional action.

"I feel we have to have military power, so I think the registration is necessary. I mean, something has to be done about what's going on in the world. If drafted, I would go. I think women should be willing to take on responsibility if drafted. Sex shouldn't have anything to do with it...On the whole, I'd rather see a peaceful agreement be made if possible," said junior Theresa Kokoski, a resident of John Quincy Adams in the Southwest Residential Area.

WELLAR LERNER KOKOSKI RUGA

Junior Glenn Ruga of North Hadley said, "I don't believe in registration. Drafts support war. War is archaic. I would register though, but I wouldn't fight for the U.S. Army...Women should have some responsibility, but they shouldn't fight...The U.S. is in trouble because they have been sticking their noses in places they shouldn't. Even though I don't support Khomeini, I support the revolutionaries and what they are doing.

"I agree there is a need for registration. It eliminates time if the draft is needed. I don't know whether I would go or not, it depends on the situation...Women should be expected to fight, I don't see why not," senior Jane Lerner said.

Sunderland resident sophomore Homas Curran said, "I agree with the President. We shouldn't be getting pushed around like this. I agree with the draft, but I hope I won't be spending my summer vacation in Afghanistan, fighting Vladimar Guschev or anyone...I think women should fight like anyone else. They're always bitching about equal rights, so let's give it to them.

"On the other hand, I think the U.S. would be the laughing stock of the planet if we sent women into the front. The Russians would probably laugh their asses off.

"I'm from Canada, so they can register all they want. I ain't goin' anywhere. If I was an American, and I was drafted, I'd go to Canada. It's nice up there...Women should definitely by ordered to fight, if a war ever broke out. Why should just guys die?...Canadians hate the Russians. I also think that Canadians are backing Americans through this whole mess," commented sophomore Paul Wellar, a Sunderland resident.

Professor questions Union fee use

By MARC FAGELSON
Special to the Collegian

The spring semester has hardly begun, and there are already signs of dissent among some of the UMass faculty concerning a much-discussed subject: the Massachusetts Society of Professors Union and its ramifications.

Ben Branch, an associate School of Business Administration professor who is taking MSP to court because he feels the way union fees are used is unfair, said yesterday, support for the task force "is difficult to gauge" but that he was optimistic.

Branch is optimistic, he said, because MSP has expressed concern over the task force's petition drive that would force an election which would determine whether MSP would remain the faculty union.

Thirty percent of 1,900 faculty signatures is needed to force an election.

Branch, who owes MSP $84 in dues, contends conscientious objectors—who are not union members—do not receive the dues rebates they should. Currently, $12-10 percent of the $194 that each professor pays—is rebated to conscientious objectors. Branch says the rebate should be approximately 40 percent.

Because the conscientious objector does not participate in the union's politics, the union's publications and lobbying are supposed to be rebated.

But, John Bracey MSP vice president and an Afro-American Professor says that Branch is "making a mountain out of a molehill."

Bracey's view is that Branch, as well as the task force is purposely getting bogged down in small details. He feels the group is attempting to attain campus leadership despite being voted down twice in the past. By splitting the faculty, as the task force is doing, the faculty's collective strength at the bargaining table is severely reduced, he said. With the time to set a new contract rapidly approaching, the division is highly derogatory, he added.

Bracey chided Branch for the dissent as well as for accepting the benefits of collective bargaining, such as raises, and then going to court with MSP over $84.

Branch wants an open audit of the union's books to find out exactly how the money is alloted. According to Branch, there is no access presently to the books. Bracey, however, says that Branch, or any member of the union can examine the ledgers at any time.

Branch's case is now in Small Claims Court, though he wants it moved to a district court to "strengthen his case."

With the courts approval to move the case up, Branch would be able to call for the "Right of Discovery" which

Committee: Boycott games

WASHINGTON (AP) — The Senate Foreign Relations Committee voted 14-0 yesterday to urge American athletes and sports fans to snub the 1980 Olympics in Moscow if the International Olympics Committee allows the Games to proceed.

The panel called on the international committee to agree with the request made by the United States Olympic Committee on Saturday that the games be cancelled or transferred if Soviet troops remain in Afghanistan beyond the Feb. 20 deadline set by President Carter.

U.S. asked to own up

(AP)—Iran's president-elect called on the United States yesterday to ackowledge its crimes in Iran as a prelude to the release of American hostages in Tehran and rejected an offer of U.S. military and economic aid after they are freed, a French newspaper reported.

The daily newspaper Le Monde also quoted president-elect Abolhassan Bani Sadr as saying while Soviet troops in neighboring Afghanistan were Iran's most immediate threat, Iran wanted no interference from either Moscow or Washington.

Saudi hikes oil cost

NEW YORK (AP)—Saudi Arabia, the largest member of the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries and supplier of about 7.4 percent of U.S. oil needs, told customers yesterday it has increased its base crude oil price by $2 to $26, Exxon corp. announced.

The 8.3 percent increase in the price of Arabian light crude, the traditional benchmark on which other OPEC prices are based, was retroactive to Jan. 1 and had been expected by many analysts.

Ted blasts Carter on issues

By DONALD M. ROTHBERG
AP Political Writer

WASHINGTON—Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, seeking to rejuvenate his presidential campaign, blamed President Carter for the Iranian crisis yesterday and said restoring draft registration is a "step across the threshhold of Cold War II."

In his own state of the union message, Kennedy also called for a six-month wage and price freeze and immediate gasoline rationing.

And the Massachusetts Democrat, whose loss to Carter in the Iowa precinct caucuses last week prompted speculation about the future of his candidacy, declared he was in the race to stay.

There was no immediate response from the White House, but, Carter has opposed mandatory wage-price controls.

Kennedy's gasoline rationing plan follows the lines of the president's standby proposal which Congress approved last year. Kennedy supported the standby rationing plan.

But this was the first time he has advocated mandatory wage and price controls. "The voluntary guidelines have run their course and failed," he said. "Inflation is out of control," he also said.

Kennedy said his proposed controls would apply not only to wages and prices but to profits, dividends, interest rates and rents.

Both Kennedy's economic controls and gasoline rationing plan would require congressional approval. Standby rationing was approved only after a protracted fight in Congress.

Kennedy delivered his speech before an audience of Georgetown University students, one week after he lost to Carter in Iowa by a 2-1 margin. That was the first test before voters in the battle for Democratic National Convention delegates.

After the speech, Kennedy flew to New York City for a campaign appearance.

"I reaffirm my candidacy for the presidency of the United States," said Kennedy. "I intend to stay the course."

After Iowa, Kennedy acknowledged he must beat Carter in the Maine caucuses Feb. 10, and in the New Hampshire primary Feb. 26.

A poll published over the weekend in the Boston Globe showed Carter leading Kennedy, 56 percent to 31 percent, among Democratic and independent voters in New Hampshire.

Kennedy's campaign has been dogged since the outset by the Iranian crisis. The U.S. Embassy in Tehran was occupied and its staff taken hostage on Nov. 4, three days before the senator declared his candidacy.

Carter favors military boost

By FRED S. HOFFMAN
AP Military Writer

WASHINGTON — President Carter said yesterday the United States must spend a record $142.7 billion next year on strengthening its defenses "to contain Soviet aggression" and assure U.S. security in the face of growing Russian military power.

Carter's budget message to Congress had the ring of the Cold War years, when U.S. policy was built around the concept of "containing" communism within its borders.

The president told Congress he could not ignore "the implications of terrorism in Iran or Soviet aggression in Afghanistan."

Only last week, Carter asserted in his State of the Union address that the United States would consider a Soviet effort to gain control of the oil-rich Persian Gulf area as a threat to U.S. vital interests and that America would act to repel such an effort.

There was little new money for most domestic programs, but dollars were found for job training, housing and revenue sharing programs to mollify key Democratic factions.

"Our forces are adequate to protect us against today's threats, but Soviet military capability is growing," Carter told Congress in the message explaining his budget for fiscal 1981, which begins Oct. 1.

"Our forces must be increased if they are to contain Soviet aggression and continue to assure our security in the future. This will require a sustained commitment over a period of years," he said.

Defense Secretary Harold Brown indicated the administration may come back to Congress later to ask for still higher military spending "in light of events that have occurred in the world after the fiscal 1981 budget was finalized in late December."

Tuition hikes under review

By JOHN BONSIGNORE
Special to the Collegian

The UMass Board of Trustees, the governing body of the University, will probably pass a motion establishing a standard tuition policy, according to Rich LaVoice, Student Government Association co-president and student trustee.

If passed, the motion will allow the trustees to set tuition in proportion to the rise in the cost of education.

The motion has passed through both the trustees' student affairs finance committees with no changes.

A memorandum issued by UMass President David C. Knapp Jan. 14 to the trustee's student affairs committee acknowledges numerous difficulties with the proposal but assures that a stable tuition policy will benefit both students and taxpayers.

Since tuition has increased by over 100 percent in the past three years, far outdistancing the rise in the costs of education, LaVoice said he agrees with Knapp's contention of the program's possible benefits.

Al Wallace, of the Student Center for Educational Research and Advocacy Rents and Fees Committee, said he was concerned that students would be paying more while the administration simultaneously cuts services.

Knapp's memorandum admits that tuition increases "do not automatically result in an increase in the University's appropriation" because tuition money in Massachusetts goes into the General Fund of the Commonwealth.

SCERA plans to organize an ad-hoc group to protest the proposal, Wallace said.

Since pressure in favor of the tuition increases has been applied by Governor Edward J. King, the trustees will probably pass the motion to save their own autonomy, LaVoice said.

The Board of Trustees will address the proposal at its next meeting Feb. 6.

Rampal serenades Fine Arts audience

By NORMA COATES
Collegian Staff

The difference between college audiences and city concert hall audiences is not felt so much from the audience itself, but from the ambience created from the mix of appreciative spectators and accoustically perfect halls, Jean-Pierre Rampal said last night. The mix in the Fine Arts Center last night was very positive, as Rampal played a superb concert with five well-done encores to a sold-out back-to-school audience.

The first half of the concert consisted of three pieces from the Baroque era: Trio Sonata in F Major and Partita in D Minor by J.S. Bach, and Trio Sonata in B-Flat Major by Telemann. John Steele Ritter provided a strong accompaniment on harpsichord, over which Rampal floated his melodies, delicate yet spirited in the faster movements, caressing and expressive in the slower movements. All of the pieces were superbly executed, confirming Rampal's reputation as the world's greatest flutist.

His technical ability was especially evident in the second half of the show, consisting of two pieces from the Romantic era of the 1800's. Franck's Sonata in A major is a demanding piece technically, but Rampal performed it with great expertise and emotion. The talents of his pianist were evident in this piece, especially in the duet between flute and piano in the final movement. The second work in this set was La Ronde des Lutins by a little-known Italian violinist of the 19th century, Bazzini. Written originally for the violin, Rampal used it as a vehicle to showcase his technical virtuosity, which he did quite successfully.

The encores were very enjoyable, all five of them. They ranged from a Mozart Sonata to an excerpt from Claude Bolling's popular Suite for Flute and Jazz piano, and included two pieces by Chopin. He seemed to enjoy performing them as much as the audience enjoyed listening to them.

Herzog's film remake Nosferatu puzzling, philosophical Dracula

By CANDYCE CARLON
Collegian Staff

The commercial acceptance of Werner Herzog's Nosferatu leaves me to wonder if the film-going public knows what it's gotten into.

While Herzog is among the more fascinating directors to emerge in recent years, his films remain relatively obscure on the distribution market and not without reason.

Films such as his Fata Morgana and La Soufriere are puzzling at best, and their pseudo-biblical narratives do not cater to a pop culture audience that has grown accustomed to Woody Allen's self-deprecating monologues or Jane Fonda's politically-correct tirades.

Nosferatu, a fairly true-to-the-original remake of F.W. Murnau's 1922 film, is, by current standards, a horror movie which has been de-fanged. Herzog's restraint at bloodletting is filled in with philosophic conversations between Count Dracula and his

Third World program will honor history

The Third World Women's Task Force will sponsor a lecture and panel discussion on "Political Repression: An International Perspective," Feb. 7 in Campus Center room 164. Child-care will be provided, according to Jamila Gaston of Everywoman's Center.

The program is being offered in cooperation with Black History Month, Gaston said. Queen Mother Moore, an 80 year-old activist with a history dating back to the Garvey movement, will speak from 4 to 5 p.m. on the Afro-American experience in the United States.

Women's center seeks volunteers for spring

Everywoman's Center, located in Wilder Hall, is seeking volunteers and interns to staff its drop-in and call-in resource and referral center for the spring semester. College credit, and possibly money, is available for this work, which begins February 19.

Interns and volunteers provide information about health concerns; do crisis intervention; and update and maintain resource files, referral books, and self-use materials on many topics of concern to women.

Amnesty group starting here

Amnesty International, a human rights movement working on behalf of "prisoners of conscience" is starting a UMass chapter.

This campus network group meets monthly to discuss violations of human rights. Its major purpose is to write letters to officials of countries where human rights are allegedly being neglected.

The group will have an information table on the Campus Center Concourse every week.

The non-profit Amnesty International is independent of all governments, political factions, ideologies and religious creeds. The worldwide organization was formed in 1961 and claims responsibility for the release of 13,000 prisoners.

Amnesty opposes torture and capital punishment. The Campus Network branch will focus on information describing foreign political prisoners. The information is gathered by the Amnesty International main office in London. Facts of American political prisoners are directed to Amnesty International groups in other countries.

Efforts by Amnesty International have reduced sentences, improved conditions, and have assured trials for prisoners. Anyone interested in the Campus Network should call 546-1296.

Five-College Board seeks new members

By SARAH HAMMANN
Collegian Staff

The Five College Student Coordinating Board welcomes new members for the spring semester. Three students from each of the five colleges form the board. There are immediate openings for university students. As members of the board, students take part in planning residential exchanges, choosing guest lecturers to visit the area and organizing its latest project, the establishment of a Five College Student Agency.

For the past few months the board has explored possible methods and means to initiate a student agency for the Pioneer Valley. For several years Harvard University has run successful student agencies which generate about $1 million annually in a seven-part operation employing nine-hundred students.

Editorial/Opinion

Free choice as a legal option

There is not now, nor is there soon likely to be, consensus among leaders or respected members of any field as to when a human life actually begins.

Some people believe that at the moment of fertilization a new individual with its own rights and legal status exists. By their standard, washing glassware in some research labs is murder.

Curiously, it was not until the latter half of the nineteenth century that the Catholic church accepted the doctrine of personhood at conception; what fresh medical, scientific, or legal evidence, in 1869, persuaded them to that doctrine is not apparent. But they, the Mormons, certain "fundamentalist" groups, and Orthodox Jews now feel this way; which is fine—for them. It is of course their right to believe as they choose. However, it is no one's right to legislate religion or philosophy into law, to be imposed upon others.

JOHN C. PARKER

Accepting personhood at conception as a concept of law would mean, in part, that the IUD couldn't be used as a means of birth control, since it prevents the implantation of a fertilized egg. It means that abortions could be performed only to avoid the death of the mother. It also would require that the fetus, at whatever stage of development, would have to be represented by a lawyer in court. We face, too, the prospect of accidental abortions during routine d and c's being considered involuntary manslaughter, and women who miscarry being charged with criminal negligence.

I find the standard of legal personhood at conception absurd and unacceptable and from my perspective and for my needs. I don't feel something one needs a handlens to see can rationally be considered the legal, moral, or philosophical equivalent of a human being. A fetus which requires a mother's body for all nutrient, oxygen, fluid, and antibody needs cannot be equal under the law to the woman who sustains it. It is indisputably life, but so is my ear.

I would never, and could never, support any legislation which would force anyone to be involved in an abortion over their own moral opposition. As a society, we must accept a diversity of opinion on many issues, and I think it important to preserve the fundamental freedom of choice. It is perhaps impossible for everyone ever to fully agree on the issue of abortion, but we must allow each person to arrive at his or her own decision. We can't allow policy or law to be bent to accommodate those who say, "I am morally opposed to abortion, so you or your loved one MUST HAVE THAT BABY!"

Unstimulus-response

The word is out! Whitmore is a fraud. The Collegian Penlight Team found this week, in an exclusive investigative report, that the Whitmore Administration Building exists as part of an experiment by the University's Department of Psychology to test human stress. The news was leaked by ex-Psychology Department Chairman Salvadore Libido, a brilliant but maladjusted professor of the behavioral sciences, who was forced to leave his job when it was found he contracted cancer after being exposed to highly-concentrated levels of ink blot tests.

Dr. Libido told the Collegian Whitmore was established in 1967 as a double-blind experiment to study the effects of excessive amounts of irritating stimuli upon human beings.

As part of the test, it was learned, young adults, most between the ages of 18-22, would be exposed to a variety of pulp-derivative external factors known, generically, as paperwork. The rationale, Dr. Libido explained, was to find out how much paperwork it would take to manifest neurotic symptoms known as p'd off. Libido reports, "After 12 years of observation of some 120,000 specimens, the results were devastating. At least 50,000 resorted to expressing their anxiety through defense mechanisms called "Blue Wall Obsession."

In addition, Libido reports, of some 60,000 students forced to interact with a conditioned-response device known as the IBM computer, 40,000 subjects acted, in Pavlovian manner, by regurgitating their dining commons rations on the steps of the Student Union Building. In this test, some 15,000 students took to deviant behavior forms such as playing games of Cosmic Wimpout for 72 hours straight. The remaining 5,000 demonstrated a diversity of behavior patterns ranging from total compliance to such psychotic resorts as Washington Tower and the UMass Library to sleeping in a Southwest dormitory for seven years.

The other variable in the experiment was the implementation of specimens extracted by a process known as bureaucratic mitosis. Dr. Libido reports, "These subjects were told they were administrators and they behaved accordingly.

They could often be observed moving in fashion from carpeted board room to carpeted board room, but we also noticed that several of them developed a physiological mutation in the form of a leather-covered object with a plastic handle protruding from their hands." Libido added that these so-called "administrators" actually believed they were performing a necessary human function, though he did note that urination and sweating also fit such description.

The other factor included in the experiment was the addition of a stress-inducing force known as "Governor King." The report notes that the subjects calling themselves "administrators" developed conditions in response to this negative reinforcer ranging from asskissing to dissidence. The factor labelled "King" incorporated such devices as "lobster luncheons, meat-cleavers, and total insensitivity to social concerns."

As a concluding point in the report, the Psychology Department noted that there were dormant periods in the experiment, where the subjects behaved more or less normally. This resulted from being exposed to such stabilizing impetuses as the appearance of Patti Smith at the 1979 Spring Concert and the 1970 visit by Three Stooges' member Moe Howard, as part of the Distinguished Visitors Program. During Mr. Howard's visit a petition was initiated by students to rename the Whitmore Administration Building "Whitmoe."

Iran already

To the Editor

As a member of Amnesty International I feel compelled to write about the situation in Iran. Amnesty International is a worldwide human rights movement which works for the release of men and women imprisioned anywhere for their beliefs, color, ethnic origin or religion provided they have not used or advocated violence. Amnesty is on record throughout the world as having condemned the gross and systematic violations of human rights in Iran under the Shah. Amnesty's Secretary General described Iran in the mid 1970's as having one of the worst human rights records of any country in the world.

It should be emphasized that Amnesty International is an impartial organization which does not favor any particular political faction, idealogy, or religion. As a result, Amnesty is also highly critical of the violations of human rights since the revolution in February 1979. Amnesty strongly opposes the fact that hundreds of prisoners have been given trials, without appeal, sentenced to death, and executed. These trials did not guarantee full rights of defences, nor did they conform to recognized international standards of legal performance.

Amnesty is consistently critical of any regime which violates human rights. The political crimes of the Shah do not excuse the crimes which have taken place since the revolution. The situation in Iran is evidence of Amnesty's contention that government should use human intellect and reason rather than gallows and death chambers to assure proper judgement and justice in this world.

★ Nosferatu

victims which seem to underscore what some reviewers have conveniently labeled the existential quality of the film.

Herzog's earlier films examined modern man in an overwhelmingly natural environment with his creations and his debris. Fata Morgana, Herzog's creation myth, contrasts the vastness of the desert with the absurdity of its human invaders; La Soufriere chronicles the hours before a volcano reclaims the island it has created from its human residents, acting as the director's destruction myth, which ironically never occurs. The style of the films resemble cinema verite but Herzog's manipulation of reality, particularly in the editing of Fata Morgana, turns into a burlesque of the human subjects.

Snake in the Garden

Herzog takes the man-nature relationship a step further with a more literary film, Woyzeck, based on a drama fragment by George Buchner. Buchner's play is the perfect vehicle for Herzog, and the director remains true to the text for the most part, as he examines the contravention of society on a man and woman in a state of nature. As Fata Morgana and La Soufriere, Woyzeck is a 'garden of eden' in which the snake has already been introduced.

The literalization of the film's metaphoric content is one of Herzog's disarming techniques. Defecating animals abound in Herzog's shots, as if to prove the camera is somehow in harmony with nature's revolt against man. Herzog's choice of Klaus Kinski for the title roles in Woyzeck, Aguirre: The Wrath of God and Nosferatu adds to the literalness of each film, as Kinski has a remarkable physical appearance that lends itself to distortion. In Woyzeck, Kinski takes the form (or formlessness) of a newborn which reveals the helplessness of his character in a society which considers him expendable.

As Aguirre, Kinski is a rather hunched and ugly brute who bullies and slaughters his way through the Peruvian jungle in search of the mythical city of El Dorado. Herzog contrasts Kinski's savage with Aguirre's very beautiful daughter and waits until she is dead for Aguirre to make a declaration of incest.

The 'madness' incurred by the jungle sojourn produces a comic literalness in the action and dialogue as Aguirre's soldiers make descriptive statements about the spears that pierce them as they die. In an inspired moment, one of the soldiers who has just been decapitated continues to speak after being separated from his body. Even as those who remain alive at the end of the film fantasize about escaping in a ship on the ocean, Herzog provides a shot of a very real ship (with a rowboat) in the top of a tree in the jungle.

Victim as Monster

Nosferatu has less of the overt comedy in Aguirre: The Wrath of God, although the clumsiness of reenacting dramatic moments from Murnau's original film takes over for the declarative statement technique. As in other films Herzog theatrically poses his actors and holds the shots for an embarassing length of time.

I suspect Kinski could have played the role of the Count without makeup but Herzog took the original for all it was worth, including Dracula's tube-like fangs, flattened ears and extraordinary fingernails. His agility at playing victims and monsters in other Herzog films is already established, and Dracula, as the viewer is reminded, is both victim and monster. The director and Kinski do not, however, portray him sympathetically. His character is very much identified with the rats and the plague which he causes.

A Plague on them

Although Kinski's presence dominates the Nosferatu, Herzog departs from the original film by using labele Adjani as a very deliberate foil for Dracula. Adjani's character, Lucy Harker, has absolutely no doubt that she is the virtuous maiden who can destroy the vampire and save her town from the plague. Her boldness is refreshing for a horror film heroine, yet, there is a certain quaintness and futility to this character who believes faith and love for her demented and oblivious husband can sustain her. Herzog reinforces the idea of futility as the dying victims of the plague have a frenzied last fling at life as they dance around coffins and feast in the town square with an incredulous Adjani looking on.

As with all his films, Herzog's photography is vivid in natural settings and Jonathan Harker's journey to Count Dracula's castle is stunning, particularly village scenes with the peasants and gypsies. They do, however, seem to be a biting parody of National Geographic travel films and must be taken with a grain of salt.

Perhaps Herzog's appearance on the American commercial film market should also be taken with a grain of salt. Despite the media attention to this film as one of a wave of horror films, Nosferatu is not part of the psycho-suspense shockers that are being produced in this country.

states that dues-collecting organizations must make their books open to those dues-paying members.

In many cases whiere the right of discovery has been used, the organization, in this case the union, drops the charges. Branch said he would not be surprised if that happened in his case.

A surprising discrepency, though, is that Massachusetts state law differs from the federal law on this count. If the case were moved to the District Court, the state Attorney General could appear to argue that the state law is constitutional.

Of the court battle, Bracey is unimpressed. "We've got nothing to hide," he said. "It's not like we've got a closet full of shoeboxes waiting to be found. He'd make things a lot easier for everyone if he'd just give us the money he owes us."

Allen undefeated

Matmen enjoy a fine 7-2 intersession

By DONNA SULLIVAN
Collegian Staff

While the average UMass student was spending the January break relaxing or mourning the lack of snow, the average UMass wrestler was chalking up win after win – pin after pin to contribute to the teams' splendid record.

The matmen went against nine teams over intersession and defeated seven to bring their all around record to 9-3. Bill McQuade at 190 pounds and heavyweight John Allen also placed first in the C.W. Post Christmas Tournament, with 126 pound Dana Rasmussen placing third and 118 pound Rich Schiarizzi placing fourth.

"They worked very hard all intersession," Head Coach Dave Amato said. "We did double sessions (10 o'clock to 12, then 4-6) all through January. Spirit was high," he said.

The wrestlers faced Princeton, King's Point, and Glassboro on January 12 to start off January action. They swept King's Point right off the mat winning ten of ten bouts for a 41-0 win. Schiarizzi sparked the attack with a pin, and McQuade and Allen cleaned up, each with a first period pin.

In the 34-9 triumph over Glassboro Allen and 150 pound Kevin Murphy each added a pin to their records. Schiarizzi, 142-pund Greg MacDonald, 177-pound Dave Guselli, and McQuade contributed to the winning effort along with some newcomers to the varsity squad, first semester freshman Brian O'Boyle wrestling in the 126 pound class, and 158 pound tri-captain Mike Carroll.

A better left unmentioned meet against Princeton saw just three successful bouts for the UMass squad. Murphy, Carroll, and Allen were UMass' only three wins, not enough to take the strong Princeton squad.

At a tri-meet on January 19 at Potsdam, UMass defeated the host team but fell to Brockport, their last loss to date. Against Potsdam, the Matmen lost just three bouts but more than made up for it with four pins. Allen chalked up his sixth pin of the season early in the first period. McQuade won with a pin in the second, and O'Boyle and another freshman 167-pound Dave McEntee pinned their opponents in the third period.

Mike Vilardi, 126 pounds, McEntee, and Allen all won in action against Brockport, McEntee bringing his personal record to two pins.

The Matmen wrestled their first meet on home turf Jan. 23 and gave the hometown fans quite a show. After eight of ten matches had been wrestled, Southern Connecticut was in the lead by one point but no one was worried, McQuade and Allen had yet to do their stuff. Both won their matches, Allen on a superior decision to give UMass a 25-19 win.

Schiarizzi started the matmen off with a pin with 25 seconds left in the first period. O'Boyle, Murphy, and Caroll also contributed big wins.

The wrestlers completed January action hosting a four team meet at Boyden gym last Saturday and sweeping all three teams.

Ten wins in ten bouts made for a 37-0 win over the Coast Guard Academy, the first of three teams to face the wrath of the matmen.

Schiarizzi, O'Boyle, Johnson, MacDonald and Murphy composed a string of three point wins for UMass interrupted by a four point superior decision for 156-pound Mike Carroll.

167-pound Dave McEntee kept spectators on the edges of their seats up until he switched the momentum of the match to his favor and chalked up a six point pin, his third, for the matmen.

Bob Clark, a newcomer to this sesason's action but not to the UMass wrestling squad wrestled a close match in the 177 pound class and came out on top, as did 190-pound McQuade who looked as though he'd met his match. McQuade held on for a close 9-7 win.

Heavyweight John Allen kept his perfect season going, and topped a perfect UMass performance with a pin one minute and seventeen seconds into the first period.

"In my last match I was not too aggressive so I tried to be very aggressive today," Allen said.

After the first match, both Allen and McQuade were through for the day winning by default and forfeit against both Albany and C.W. Post.

The matmen were handed a 32-12 win over Albany after Albany forfeited two and defaulted two matches.

UMass finished the day with a 28-19 win over a tough C.W. Post squad. 156-pound Mike Carroll scored a big pin just 56 minutes into the first period. Bob Clark was clearly the better wrestler in the 177-pound class taking a 8-0 superior decision.

DeVarney wins dash

Trackmen look polished; place well at Harvard

By JANE WOLFSON

Sunday afternoon the UMass men's indoor track team participated in the New England AAUs held at the Harvard University Indoor Track and Field Facility. The meet is annually sponsored by the Greater Boston Track Club and the Friends of Harvard Track.

Amid the over 1200 competitors the Minutemen ran some of the best times and put on their most impressive display of running of the season.

The highlight of the afternoon came in the men's mile race when Mark Belger, a Villanova graduate, ran the first sub-four minute mile in the history of New England Indoor Track, his time was 3:57.4. Finishing third in that same race was UMass tri-captain Steve MacDougall with a time of 4:08.8, his best time of the season. Sophomore Paul Beaulieu finished seventh at 4:10.1.

Sophomore sprinter Bill DeVarney won the 60-yard dash with a time of 6.46. He was the only Minuteman to win an event on the afternoon.

The UMass two mile relay team finished second, losing to Fordham University by less than a tenth of a second at 7:46.6. Running that relay was senior tri-captain Mickey Baugh, senior Rick Walls, Beaulieu, and MacDougall.

The mile relay team of sophomore Steve Gorman, junior Paul King, Bob Pearson, and junior tri-captain Rick Trunfio placed third finishing with a time of 3:27.4. "It was a great experience to run with so much good competition and see world class performances," said Gorman.

It was also a day for UMass coaches as Pete Pfitzinger, the women's cross country coach, running for the Greater Boston Track Club, placed third in the 5000 meter run. His time was 14:04, a personal best. And Assistant Track Coach Brady Meyer finished sixth in the triple jump at 45'3"

"Harvard has one of the fastest tracks in New England," explained MacDougall. "A lot of the guys had their best performances, the good competition brought out the best in a lot of people."

The UMass women's swim team lost to Southern Connecticut by a score of 76-64 Saturday.

UMass' Jennifer Black and Caroline Benjamin collaborated for a one-two finish in the 500 yd. freestyle. Ellen Schmidt from Southern won the 200 yd. individual medley and in the process set a pool record of 2:19.4. UMass' Leslie Johnson captured second place.

UMass' Judy Miller came out blazing in the 100 yd. freestyle, winning the event and setting a new pool record of 56.0. Southern placed second and third. Nancee Shifflett and Judy Goffi swam to a one-three finish in the 50 yd. backstroke which gave UMass a one-point lead. In the 50 yd. breastroke Theresa Totin and Nancy Collins finished second and third, setting pool records with times of 33.1 and 35.6. Another two-three finish was captured by Jennifer Black and Celia Walsh in the 100 yd. butterfly event.

Hoopwomen host Chiefs

By DANNY GUIDERA
Collegian Staff

Tonight the Minutewomen play their first game of the semester as they take on the Chiefs of Springfield College at the Curry Hicks Cage. The Minutewomen, currently 8-6, are coming off consecutive victories over Connecticut and Boston University. UMass defeated the Terriers 76-59 last Saturday in the Cage's first women's basketball game of the year.

The Minutewomen, who have won three of their last four games after a rocky start of intercession, are ranked number one in the New England women's coaches poll. Springfield is in the top spot in Division Two of the New England Poll.

Springfield, 11-12 on the season, is riding an eight game winning streak that has seen them defeat Central Connecticut (previously ranked number one in Division Two) and New Hampshire, who downed the Minutewomen earlier this month.

The Chiefs' attack is led by 5'9" sophomore forward Anita Thomas who has been averaging 16.1 points per game and 7.8 rebounds. Thomas, who has been shooting 51.1 percent from the floor "hits her baseline jumper with regularity," according to Springfield College Sports Information Director Howard Davis.

Starting in the frontcourt with Thomas is 5'11" forward Randi Zola (13.6 ppg, 6.6 rebounds) and 6' sophomore center Debbie Halstead who has been averaging 11.5 points on the season and sweeping the boards with a team leading 8.7 carroms per game.

During the winning streak, Springfield has been outscoring its opponents by a better than twenty-one point margin. Last season the Minutewomen downed the Chiefs twice, by scores of 82-77 and 88-60

Game time is 8:00

Six escape Tehran

Friendly embassies hid Americans

Associated Press

Six American diplomats who escaped capture when the U.S. Embassy was seized Nov. 4 slipped out of Tehran after 12 weeks in hiding, helped by the Canadian Embassy and an elaborate ruse of false identities and forged documents, it was disclosed Tuesday.

Word of the dramatic flight from Tehran came as ailing Iranian leader Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini went on national radio to make an emotional appeal for Iranians to support their new president, Abolhassan Bani Sadr.

The 79-year-old revolutionary leader, in an apparent allusion to his heart ailment, called on Iranians to remain "without fear, no matter whether a person comes or a person goes...." The last medical report on the hospitalized Khomeini listed him in satisfactory condition.

The bold escape of a half-dozen U.S. diplomats from central Tehran caught the embassy militants off guard yesterday.

"That's illegal! That's illegal!" one of the militants cried to a Western reporter when told of the ruse.

Ever since the militants seized the embassy Nov. 4 to press demands for the return of the ousted Shah Mohammad Reza Pahlavi, there have been unconfirmed reports in Tehran that embassy staff members who avoided capture were hiding out in the embassies of other friendly nations.

Then, after Canada unexpectedly shut down its embassy Monday and withdrew its small staff, the Montreal newspaper La Presse published an article in its Tuesday editions saying some U.S. diplomats had been harbored in the Canadian mission and were spirited out in the previous day or two under cover of false Canadian passports.

U.S. and Canadian officials later confirmed the basics of the report. State Department officials said the Americans had been in "friendly embassies," but the Canadians said all were at the Canadian mission. This seemed to indicate that some not originally at the Canadian mission apparently gathered there later.

Decision-makers in Washington and Ottawa decided to act when they did because "we knew everyday that the danger was becoming greater," Canadian Foreign Minister Flora MacDonald told a news briefing. "It was only a matter of time before the Iranians came to know about this."

The State Department identified the six who escaped as Mark Lijek, a consular officer; his wife, Cora Amburn Lijek, who was employed by the embassy as a consular assistant; Roger G. Anders, a consular officer; Henry L. Schatz, an agricultural attache; Joseph D. Stafford, a consular officer, and his wife, Kathleen F. Stafford, who also was employed as a consular assistant. The department did not release their hometowns.

A Canandian Foreign Ministry spokesman said the six were in West Germany, but their precise whereabouts and travel plans were not immediately disclosed.

Miss MacDonald said the Americans stayed in the Tehran homes of Canadian diplomats and flew out of Iran over the weekend with Canadian passports, just before Canadian Am-

Unlimited access ends

Library remains a towering problem

The open and shut again library: It's closed again. (Collegian file photo)

By LAURA OWENS
Special to the Collegian

As another semester begins at UMass, students are faced with new courses, more books, and old problems—among them the library.

Open only briefly to the entire student body during finals week last semester, the tower is once again closed to undergraduates as access is restricted to faculty and graduate students only. Goodell Library, however, is open to the general public—with staff members there doing what they can to accommodate students under existing circumstances.

Both the tower and Goodell are currently staffed with numerous full-time and part-time employees, the majority working in Goodell. At present, the main purpose of the thinly-staffed tower crew is to enforce the paging and pass systems.

Undergraduates can gain access to the main library by obtaining a pass. Two types of passes are issued. The first, a semester pass, is given only to undergraduates working on an honors thesis or having some other extensive research to do. An ID must be presented at all times and the passes may be obtained at the Library director's office. The second type is a day pass. The purpose of this is for students who need information located in the tower and not available at Goodell, such as older periodicals. These passes are issued from the Reference Office upon presentation of a UMass ID. Both types of passes are available to any five-college area student.

With Goodell able to house only a fraction of the books normally stacked in the main library, it has been necessary to institute a paging system in which the two libraries can accommodate each other.

Mr. Richard Talbot, director of the library, estimates that Goodell contains roughly 250,000 books and volumes as well as periodicals and videocassettes. The tower contains approximately a million more, he said. The paging system enables a student to put in a request for a particular book or piece of information and receive it within two hours. Those who don't wish to wait the two hours are issued a day pass and allowed to retrieve the information themselves from the main library.

Talbot said that he sees the pass system as fading out in

UMass workers charge union on pay policies

By MARC FAGLESON
Special to the Collegian

More discrepancies in union policies have resulted in a growing dissatisfaction with their union among staff maintenance workers.

The workers are hired by the University to perform maintenance work and are paid a pre-determined wage for the work. What is upsetting the workers, according to Steve Kozloski, head of the Physical Plant's safety department, is that the Association of Federal, State, County and Municipal Employees Local 1776 is using a double wage.

Kozloski says that these workers, all of whom are licensed tradesmen, are doing construction work on the Brett Dormitory with similarly licensed and represented tradesmen from the private sector. The workers from the private sector, however, receive twice the pay that those employed by the University receive.

Kozloski says the University employees were hired for maintenance work, not construction. The construction pay scale is twice as high, yet the workers receive the same pay as if they were still doing maintenance work.

Because the tradesmen from the private sector are not employed regularly by the University, they receive the full scale pay, Kozloski added.

All the workers are represented by the same union, however. They all have the same licenses, do the same work, and have similar experience and seniority, said Kozloski. The only difference is salaries.

Kozloski is also charging the union with paying back to its members insufficient rebates for the union's various political and "self-serving" activities. In a January 21 hearing, Kozloski agreed to pay his agency fees if, the union's rebate procedure was made available to him.

The rebate procedure, according to Kozloski, was incomplete, however. He said the financial breakdown of the union's various activities which included a float in the Rose Bowl parade, as well as open lobbying for political candidates, was not made clear in terms of amounts in the rebate procedure form.

He's also upset by a $503.66 agency fee transfer, which appeared on the union's 1977 financial statement, that "disappeared" from the budget in 1978.

Reagan points to failures

WEST SPRINGFIELD (AP)—Ronald Reagan said yesterday that the two challenges Jimmy Carter identified at the beginning of his presidency—inflation and energy—have become the two major disasters of his administration.

The former California governor, campaigning for the Republican presidential nomination, spoke Tuesday afternoon to a luncheon crowd of about 400 persons.

Reagan said that to listen to Carter asking Americans to make sacrifices, "You'd think...that someone else was in charge" in Washington.

Five found dead on cutter

ST. PETERSBURG, Fla. (AP)—Divers searching the flooded compartments of a sunken Coast Guard cutter found the bodies of five more sailors yesterday, raising the death toll to six, and hope was running out for 17 others missing following a collision with an oil tanker.

"As time goes by, the hope grows less," said Coast Guard Capt. Marshal Gilbert.

Senate urges Olympic boycott

WASHINGTON (AP) —The Senate voted overwhelmingly yesterday to urge all Americans, not just athletes, to boycott the 1980 Summer Olympics as a protest against the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan if the Games go on as scheduled in Moscow.

The resolution offers an alternative to a boycott by urging the International Olympic Committee to cancel, postpone or relocate the Games. But IOC members have already indicated they will reject this request. The vote was 88 to 4.

The four votes against the resolution were cast by Sens. Rudy Boschwitz, R-Minn.; Mark Hatfield, R-Ore.; Ted Stevens, R-Alaska; and Paul Tsongas, D-Mass.

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, DMass., a Democratic presidential hopeful, did not vote although he was in a Senate office building conducting a news conference.

Mass. may lose House seat

WASHINGTON (AP)—Census Bureau estimates show that Massachusetts could lose one seat in the House of Representatives next year because of the population shift from the snowbelt to the sunbelt.

"These are just educated guesses. Massachusetts could wind up with the same number of seats it has now," Arthur Mielke of the Census Bureau said yesterday.

The Census Bureaus's estimates indicate Massacusetts is the only New England state that could have the number of its representatives in the House changed.

Theater Guild opens auditions for 'Applause'

By MICHAEL MARTINEAU
Collegian Staff

The UMass Musical Theater Guild has announced auditions for its spring musical, "Applause," will be held Monday, Feb. 4, and Tuesday, Feb. 5 at 7:00 p.m. in the Commonwealth Room. Auditions are open to all five-college students, including non-theater majors. Auditioners will be expected to read for roles, sing and dance.

"Applause" is a musical based on a successful movie of the 1950's, "All About Eve;" the story of Margo Channing, an aging star whose career is threatened by a back-stabbing understudy, Eve Harrington. It is a paradoxical look at both the glamorous and seamier sides of show business.

A look at what's upcoming in performing arts. Page 9.

The show has a reputation as a crowd pleaser, containing flashing production numbers and tense dramatic moments as well as comic relief. The book for the stage version was written by Betty Comden and Adolph Green, who have numerous Broadway and screen writing credits. The musical opened on Broadway in 1970, and had a run of over 700 performances, capturing several Tony awards, including Lauren Bacall for Best Actress, and Best Musical.

The show is being produced by the UMass Musical Theater Guild, a student-run organization which last semester presented the world premiere of "Just Friends of 1923." Past Guild productions include "A Funny Thing Happened on the Way to the Forum," "Two Gentlemen of Verona," and "Anything Goes."

"Applause" will be directed by Bob Straforsky, who comes to the organization with extensive experience in community theater. The musical director will be Peter J. Tolan, whose name is familiar to UMass students for his comedy revues "Now You See It, Wish You Didn't," and "Now You See It, Wish You'd Seen It, Last Semester," which he wrote and directed. The choreographer will be Cindy Vidal, a student in the dance department. Guild president Mark Kittlaus encouraged students to get involved.

Senate plans loaded agenda for meeting

By ED LEVINE
Collegian Staff

The Undergraduate Student Senate will address a variety of issues tonight at its first meeting of the Spring semester.

Among the topics to be discussed by the Senate are the proposed selective service registration, conflicts with the University administration, and a proposal calling for the installation of fences near the Southwest residential area.

The Senate will be briefed on the activities of the Senate Coordinating Committe, which acted for the Senate during the intersession period, Student Government Association co-President Rich LaVoice said yesterday. The highlights of the committee's actions will be presented to the Senate for its approval, LaVoice said.

A plan calling for the installation of fences along Commonwealth Avenue near the Southwest residential area will also be presented to the Senate. The Senate will hear the details of the plan from members of the University Physical Planning Committee, said Kirm Kirschner, an assistant to LaVoice and an observer of the committee.

The Senate will be asked to record its recommendations, which will be forwarded to UMass Chancellor Henry Koffler, Kirschner said.

Senate speaker David Routhier said he plans to address the Senate on the SGA reaction to a memorandum recently issued by Dean of Students William F. Field. The document, which alleges violations of personnel and financial procedures by the SGA will be addressed by the SGA in a pamphlet to be distrubuted next week, Routhier said.

The Senate is scheduled to meet at 7 p.m. tonight in room 163 of the Campus Center.

Madson: Tuition spared next year

Dennis L. Madson , vice chancellor for student affairs, said yesterday the newly proposed tuition increase, which would be implemented over a three-year period, will not affect next year's tuition—which has already been set.

Madson said the UMass Board of Trustees proposal, which would take into account the rate of inflation, is trying to determine a way to predict tuition from year to year, adding the three-year program "would not automatically be triggered."

Madson said the board, in proposing the increase, has considered students' ability to pay their fee bills, each family's "real" disposable income, inflation, the total cost of education, and the proposal's effect on enrollment.

Nancy Eddy bows out of Amherst politics

By DEBBIE ROBERTI
Collegian Staff

Nancy Eddy, the second woman to become a member of the Board of Selectmen in Amherst since 1950, has decided not to run for re-election when her term expires this April. After serving for nine years, Eddy feels the need for new challenges. "A decade in office is enough," Eddy said in a Collegian interview, "and it is time for someone else with new ideas."

Before Eddy was elected to office, she was a member of the Amherst Planning Board, and served in numerous town committees. She was also president of the Massachusetts League of Cities and Towns and the Masachusetts Municipal Association, where she represented 351 cities and towns in the commonwealth.

One of Eddy's more important positions was chairperson of the Local Governors Advisory Committee established by Governor Michael Dukakis. The committee consisted of 21 local officials and still meets with the governor once a month to discuss municipal and state issues.

Eddy first became interested in politics when she joined the League of Women Voters to which she was later elected president. "I found the League of Women Voters to be a useful organization for learning about government and for taking action on specific issues of concern," Eddy said. "The League also served as an excellent training in politics."

Last May, Eddy became the Assistant Dean of Administration at Holyoke Community College. Her work at the college includes personnel, finances, and securing the grounds. She is also monitoring the construction of a new campus center there. "I enjoy the job and find working at a community college to be an interesting experience because it gives opportunity to those individuals who may never find it elsewhere," Eddy said.

Eddy said she finds being a woman politician was both easy and difficult. She encourages other women to get involved, and said that local government is a good start because the issues are definable but still complex. Eddy also commented that "these women should be interested in the issues and not just in politicking."

The voters have become more receptive to women in office, Eddy said, as more women have entered the field. "However, I look forward to the day when being a woman is neither an advantage nor a disadvantage, but simply irrelevant," she added.

New single labels band: 'Shape of Things to Come'

By BRETT MILANO
Collegian Staff

The Headboys (RSO)

The Headboys' current single, "The Shape of Things To Come",is one of this year's finest. It starts with a metallic lead guitar, builds with some well-arranged vocals and ornate keyboard runs and finally hits you with a chorus that's unforgettable. It's inventive and energetic. And unlike other records which have gotten the "power pop" tag, it doesn't sound like a throwback to the mid-Sixties.

The single is also the opening track on the Headboys' debut album. While the album has other impressive tracks—eleven of them, infact—none of them approach the grandeur of the single. The rest of the album is less ambitious, and more grounded in conventional pop forms.

But the band still has an undeniable talent for writing, and none of these tracks are throwaways. They rock well on "Kicking the Kans," construct some strong melodies on the softer tracks, and give a nod toward the Genesis school of progressivism on "Experiments". But only on "The Shape of Things to Come" are they able to do all of this at once.

Inconsistent as it may be, the Headboys' album is still worth investigating. All they need are a couple of strong follow-ups, and they could become one of the major singles bands of the 1980's.

Black Affairs

Food for Thought

During the Fall semester people were a little dismayed over the concert scene. Basically, a majority of the gripes were based on the talent chosen. Others commented on the individuals who were responsible for concerts. This was not a direct criticism on the people who put in an honest effort. Problems were mainly based on the small budget allocated to the Duke Ellington Music Series, lack of staff and community support.

In trying to mobilize interest in Third World concerts, the Duke Ellington Music Series personnel have formed into a solid unit. Their main objectives would concentrate on concerts that represent a community concept. This concept could easily include Reggae, Black Classical, Soul, Funk, and etc.

In an effort to assist the group in their new direction, the following survey will try to determine what the community wants for a Spring festival. Although, I am aware of the financial limitation, the survey represents an immediate level of entertainers. People having other suggestions on individuals and groups should write them in.

bassador Ken Taylor and the three remaining embassy staff members pulled out.

The La Presse report said Ambassador Taylor had first considered smuggling the Americans overland across the Turkish border at night but decided the risks were too great.

Instead, the newspaper said, Taylor gradually registered some of the Americans as Canadian Embassy personnel or changed their papers to enable them to pass as American civilians, rather than American diplomats.

It said the Canadians had help from American "security services" in doing this.

Canadian officials said they chose not to disclose the escape after it took place for fear it would anger the Iranians and endanger the U.S. Embassy hostages.

Editorial/Opinion

An introduction to some purpose

ERIC JANSZEN

This semester I am going to write a weekly column, mostly while I'm sitting in my apartment with the thermostat set cheaply at sixty degrees. A sixty-degree room is an awfully cold place to be thinking and writing in; the temperature is bound to have an effect—is having an effect—or I could wear a lot of sweaters.

In any case, the writing that comes out of this place will be taking up a substantial amount of space on the editorial page(s), which you pay for, so you deserve an explanation of why I am writing this column and of what I expect to be writing about. You might ask, "So what?" And that is usually the most important question of all, one we often neglect to pose before our teachers, parents, and friends when they are lecturing us about things like early twentthieth century American political-economics, getting good grades, or turning your stereo down before the guy upstairs trying to concentrate on the Celtics - Cavaliers game comes down to rip your lungs out.

Most of these people, when asked to explain what these things have to do with man and his universe or how we are all to become better people, will think you are trying to make trouble—and you are. That's what you're here for; to trouble yourself and others with questions which are hard, though not impossible, for you and other people to answer. You and other people will be inconvenienced and sometimes angered because, by asking the right questions, you will intrude on the comforting privacy of being so caught-up in what is being done that why it is being done is no longer considered.

For instance, I am writing this column. Without getting boringly deep into the adversities of newspaper work, consider what lunatic motivations might possess you to attempt pulling together enough coherent thought to fill twelve column inches a week; to have it ignored, praised, or laughed at by thousands of people you'll never meet. Why would anyone want to do this? And for what?

These questions would not be important if I were writing for a privately owned magazine on a subject you don't care about. If that were the case you could pick the magazine up, glance at it, grunt, and put it back. But you have already paid for what I am going to be writing, if your bill has been cleared. So I, and the rest of us down here, are obligated to present information which concerns you. You, in turn, have a responsibility to tell us what's on you mind.

There are a couple of ways for you to do this. One way is, of course, to write letters to the editor. Another way is to write your own column since, as of this day, there are still a few column spaces available. The procedure for getting a column is simple: Submit two or more aticles for review by the executive editor, Rob Burbank, who will be selecting columnists on the basis of writing quality, editorial responsibility—that sort of thing.

As for me, I write a column because you and the people who dwell down here under the Campus Center will let me, I hope. And I would like to write about things that are important to you, like life. If life seems like too general a subject for a columnist to be basing his writing on, consider this: Sometimes generalizations are useful, and sometime they're not.

Afghans need students'

By Dr. Bashir Zikria and Nehla Zikria

Two decades ago it was not considered proper for the students to be involved in politics. However, the active participation of students on most of the American campuses on the issues of the unjust American War in Vietnam during the 60's and early 70's has proven the wisdom of such participation. It had its effect on the American nation and thus exerted a significant influence on the Congress, Senate, and foreign policy of the administration. It touched every American youth as a valiant peaceful struggle in the name of high ideals of human rights, the right for self-determination, and the notions of freedom and liberty which formed the foundations of this great democracy.

Today, an unjust imperialistic war is waged by the Soviet Union in the impoverished, innocent nation of Afghanistan. Presently, 50,000 crack soldiers of the U.S.S.R. are forcefully occupying, bombarding, using devastating MIG21's and 23's with napalm, modern montain artillery, and T-62 tanks. Within the past twenty months, they have been the cause of 250,000 deaths of our people inflicted by Russian equipment and advisers through their puppet Afghan governments. Since Christmas day they have rolled their tanks over the religious national opposition of Afghans and finished the resistance once and for all by commiting naked genocide with their continued invasion and raping of our country.

Since the American students did not refrain from rising against their own government in the war against the people of Vietman, we, the Afghan students, request and expect the same response by American students against the inhuman slaughter and oppression of our people by the U.S.S.R.

If we sincerely believe in the rights of oppressed people, if we sympathize with the oppressed, and if we truly believe in truth, freedom, liberty, human rights, and dignity, then we should rise on every occasion when helpless people are ruthlessly oppressed, and human rights and decency are violated.

American students have proven to the world their loyalty to those high human values even when those values were violated by their own government. Therefore, we ask of you to form commitees to help refugees and to exert your influence upon world opinion against the unjustified and inhuman war that the Soviet government is waging in Afghanistan; a country, once independent, proud, and, free-once called by Zoraster the "land of high flags."

Editor's note:

This article was received from Nehla Zikria, an Afghan student attending Georgetown University.

Letters

Alumnus appalled by student misconduct

To the Editor:

It troubles me to read, in the Dec. 79-Jan. 80 issue of "The Alumnus", of the vandalism, violence and despoiling of the campus and buildings last Halloween.

An educated person, to my way of thinking, is one who not only has acquired some knowledge beyond that of the average individual, but also—and perhaps more importantly—has learned that a well educated person conducts himself in a manner that sets him above the ordinary person.

Infantile behavior, destructive behavior, poor manners, and a slovenly way of life are the marks of an uneducated person with little or no pride in self.

The presence of persons on campus who were not University of Massachusetts students, and who were held responsible for some of the incidents, does not relieve the student body from blame. If the students had pride in the appearance of the campus and buildings and were concerned about the reputation of the university and their own reputation as students, outsiders could have done little, or no harm.

Collegians, where is your pride?

An American in Iran: One man's ordeal

ROB BURBANK

When Gary Fountain arrived in Iran, he didn't think anything was wrong.

Gary is an American who is now living in New Bedford, Massachusetts.

He graduated from high school in 1976, after which he attended East Coast Aerotechnical Institute in Lexington. Following graduation he was hired by Bell Helicopter International. After spending seven weeks at Bell's training center in Texas, where he was educated about the history, people, culture, and current situation of Iran, he was sent to that country to work for Bell.

According to Fountain, the U.S. Department of Defense had a contract with the Shah to train pilots and mechanics to maintain army helicopter units.

"Their program did not work as efficiently as it should have," Fountain said snidely. "I was a certified instructor, but as it turned out, I did not instruct. We could not tell an Iranian to do anything he did not want to do."

Fountain arrived in Isfahan, Iran in September of 1978, along with 15 other American employees of Bell. He said, "I went over there innocent, trying to do a good job, and I was treated like shit."

He said the situation was not bad at first, but hostility toward Americans grew. In mid-October, Fountain said an employer told the American employees what to wear, where to go, and when to stay in their apartments. Fountain didn't see enough urgency in these orders and said he was out playing ball with some Iranian children during one time he had been told not to be outside.

The situation soon worsened, however, and following bombings by Iranian militants, the Iranian government imposed an 8 o'clock p.m. curfew. Fountain said they were warned that anyone found outside after 8 p.m. would be arrested and, if they resisted arrest, they would be shot.

Fountain said there were few direct threats against Americans, but in December his lead mechanic was hit in the face with a brick thrown by an Iranian in a passing automobile.

Fountain said while Khomeini was in power in France, he was telling Iranian store owners not to sell goods to Americans. Some, he said, continued to trade with Americans and their stores were bombed.

Fountain hastened to note that there was one Iranian storekeeper who was kind to him and continued to sell him goods all the time he was there. He knows of no harm that may have befallen him.

Most times the country was in a state of disorder, Fountain explained. While he was there he exerienced anti-shah based strikes by the radio, TV, and power companies, gasoline stations, and the mail service. At this writing he is still receiving mail at his house which had been sent to him while he was in Iran.

Fountain's wife, Jennifer, an American he met in Iran and wed upon their return to the states, said she had learned from a source in Iran that the probable reason for Iranian hostility against Americans arised from a misinterpreted radio broadcast.

Apparently, Iran radio broadcast a statement claiming that Pesident Carter supported the shah for the numerous executions he had ordered.

Fountain said he thought the anti-shah sentiment was due in part to his history of oppression and in part because of the educational programs he instituted, by which the Iranian people became aware of their position in the world.

In his opinion, the Iranian people were given too much freedom too fast. "I felt sorry for them, because they were poorly educated," he said. "I saw people arc welding with no masks on, watching the arc."

He also mentioned that Iran possessed the most sophisticated air tracking system the United States had ever sold another country, but it was not hooked up.

Fountain said the situation was oppressive but bearable.

Then, within the first few days of January, he said he was intentionally harassed by Iranians in a pick-up truck who tried to run the car he was driving off the road.

It was then he decided to leave the country. Bell helicopter, however had no evacuation plan for its employees, he claimed. He said Bell denied there was any imminent danger and told employees they would be fired if they left Iran.

One of the employees silk screened several t-shirts in the wake of this announcement, one of which Fountain still wears, which says, "Stay and Die for BHI."

Nonetheless, he planned to board one of seven Pan Am flights out of Iran during the first and second weeks of January. This, however, proved to be a difficult endeavor. As Fountain relates, payroll checks were late and when they did arrive the banks were closed due to a strike. Then, money (which the employees had earned) was not allowed to enter the country.

Fountain sold his furniture to some Iranian friends for a fraction of its worth to buy a plane ticket.

By this time, official word was issued, telling Fountain and others that they must leave the country. More problems existed—the airports were on strike. No one could leave if they wanted to.

Finally, on January 13, 1979, Fountain was able to board a plane and return to the United States.

Bell Helicopter International offered to rehire Fountain the following May. He declined the offer.

Of his ordeal, Fountain said, "The whole experience can be summed up as bizarre."

Minutewomen triumph with second half spree

By DANNY GUIDERA
Collegian Staff

The women's basketball team came out charging in the second half of last night's game against Springfield College to overcome a halftime deficit and throttle the Chiefs 85-69.

The win, UMass' third victory in a row and the fourth in its last five games, runs the Minutewomen's record to 9-6 and sets the scene for tomorrow night's showdown against Providence College ranked number one in New England at Providence.

"We just made up our minds to get out there and play," said Minutewomen head coach Mary Ann Ozdarski. "We're a good team and we decided that's what we were going to do."

As the first half opened it looked like it was shaping up to be a high-scoring shoot-out as both teams traded baskets with regularity. Tricia Corcoran (who hit for six of her ten points within the first three and a half minutes of play) and Val DePaolo (15 points on the game) got the Minutewomen on the board early.

Springfield College paced the Minutewomen almost basket for basket as the Chiefs drove baseline effectively and hit on long jumpers. Both squads shot 51 percent from the floor in the first half.

Julie Ready, who led Minutewomen scorers with 20 points, took a sharp pass from DePaolo and laid it in at 12:09 to make the score 21-16, the biggest UMass advantage of the half.

The Chiefs pulled ahead with five minutes remaining in the half 32-31 as forward Randi Zola hit a long bomb for two of her sixteen points on the evening. The game see-sawed that way until the end of the half when Springfield took a 41-39 lead into the locker room.

It was then that the Minutewomen went to work.

"We played them even in the first half," said assistant coach Steve Jefferson, "and went out there and played in the second half." The Minutewomen, after playing the Chiefs even for much of the second stanza, exploded at the seven-minute-mark in a spread that was to see UMass run off thirteen unanswered points to ice the UMass' victory at 77-65.

Keys to the UMass second half explosion were Ready, who scored 12 of her 20 in the second half and forward Ginger Legare, who scored 17 on the night, 13 of them after halftime.

The Minutewomen outscored Springfield by a margin of 46-28 in the second half and they again shot better than 50 percent from the floor in the second half. UMass hit 37 of 73 from the floor and 11 of 16 from the free throw line on the night.

Center Ready crashed the boards for 11 rebounds on the night and Legare pulled down nine. Sue Peters played her usual steady game hitting for 17 points and feeding her teammates for nine assists. DePaolo set up many buckets on her nifty passing and had six assists as did senior forward Jen Parker.

Anita Thomas led all scorers as the Springfield forward tallied 22 points on the night, many with bombs from the corners.

Freshman guard Marlene Susienka saw a good deal of playing time in last night's win as Sherry Collins remains on the disabled list with a back injury suffered in last week's loss to New Hampshire.

Ski teams not deterred by lack of natural snow

Women

By STEVEN SEGAL
Special to the Collegian

The UMass women's ski team swept the slopes winning the first two Intercollegian League meets on the weekend of January 19-20 at Berkshire East. Despite the loss of most of last year's skiers as well as variable skiing conditions the women's team proved to be as strong as ever.

This year the league competition consists of women from Smith, Amherst, Boston College and New Hampshire College.

The first race held on Saturday was a slalom. The weather was warm, causing the snow to soften and form ruts. The Minutewomen skied through these ruts with ease, placing seven skiers in the top ten.

Leading the women to victory by three seconds was Sue "Sweepy" Voll with finishing total time of 70.32 seconds. Carla Anderson from Smith College placed second with a time of 73.30 seconds, and close behind was Barbara Reynard from UMass, who finished third with a time of 73.72 seconds.

Finishing fourth from UMass was Laurie Valenti with a time of 74.95 seconds. The final results of this race were Smith College finishing second, Boston College third and Amherst College fourth.

Originally, a giant slalom was scheduled to take place on Sunday but due to the lack of snow another slalom event was held. Despite the icy and fast conditions, the UMass women showed their supericrity once again. Voll skied another victory race with a winning total time of 75.51 seconds. Placing second was Reynard, who finished with a time of 81.01 seconds. Finishing third was Anderson, followed by Valenti, who finished fourth.

Men

By ANTHONY KUNDERT
Special to the Collegian

The UMass men's ski team raced to a first and second place finish at Berkshire East in Charlemont on Jan. 18 and 19. Seven teams competed in the Osborne League race including Amherst, Boston College, Brown, Northeastern, Plymouth State and UConn. The two races were the first league races of the season.

Two slalom races were held on a shorter than normal course because of the lack of natural snow.

Saturday brought warm temperatures and soft snow, making the course rut-filled for latter racers. After the first run of the slalom, UMass had seven out of eight starters finishing in the top 12 and victory seemed assured. In the second run bad luck plagued the team; three skiers fell on the course.

Each team counts the five best times so UMass was left with only four times of racers. The fifth time came from one of the racers who had fallen. The end result was that the team placed second, with the win going to Plymouth State.

The second day was cold and windy making the slalom course icy. The ice did not seem to bother UMass as they skied to a convincing victory over Plymouth State and Northeastern. All eight skiers finished both runs and placed in the top sixteen.

There was a special award given to the combined victor of the two races. This award was in honor of a former Amherts College racer who recently died of cancer. UMass skier Bob Grout was the male recipient of the award because of his two victories.

Trackwomen running well

By JAMES GRAHAM
Collegian Staff

Despite losing several key members over intersession, the UMass women's track team competed successfully in three invitational meets during the semester break. Eight Minutewomen traveled to the Boston College Holiday meet on December 28 to turn in some of their best performances of the season.

Sophmore Judy McCrone ran her best ever two-mile at BC in 10:50, just five seconds off the qualifying time for the nationals. Close to Mc Crone was teammate Linda Welzel who ran a strong 11:04 for the two-mile. Other top performances were turned in by Caroline Gardner who ran the 800 meters in 2:26, Jackie Budrow who finished sixth in the dash and by Micki Callahan who placed sixth in hurdles and second in the long jump with a leap of 6'43/4". Julie Horgan fared well in the high jump with a height of 5'.

Traveling to the Dartmouth Relays January 11-13 were McCrone and Welzel who again turned in top times in the mile of 5:03 and 5:09, finishing second and fourth respectively. Sophmore Cathy Petrick, running her last race for UMass this year, ran 10:27 in the 3000 meters in one of her best races. Callahan once again made the finals in the long jump with a jump of 15'11¼.

In their last meet of intersession the Minutewomen fared well at the New England AAU Invitationals last Sunday. McCrone placed third in the mile with a 5:04 while Julie Burke turned in a strong race in the 3000 meters finishing fifth in 10:12. Sophmore Robyn Dally and senior captain Caroline Shea ran 2:24 and 2:25 in the 800 meters respectively. It was Shea's best 800 by six seconds. Callahan jumped a 16'1" in the long jump which was good for seventh place.

The Minutewomen will return to action this Saturday at URI in a meet against URI and UConn. Over intersession the team lost four of its top distance runners. Seniors 'Dill' Wilson and Monica Scott have left for the rest of the season. Junior Linda Welzel will be out for the rest of the year with a knee injury and sophomre Cathy Petrick has left for an exchange in France.

Sports Roundup

LAKE PLACID, N.Y. (AP)—Denmark has withdrawn from the 1980 Winter Games here next month, the Lake Placid Olympic Organizing Committee announced Teusday.

A statement from the Danish Olympic Committee said the country's withdrawal was not politically motivated. It said Denmark withdrew from the Games because its Olympic committee felt none of its athletes was capable of winning a medal. The Danes originally had intended to compete in slalom and giant slalom and cross-country skiing.

The withdrawal dropped to 37 the number of countries that will participate in the Winter Games, which begin Feb. 12.

BOSTON (AP)—Boston Bruins President Paul A. Mooney announced yesterday he has fined General Manager Harry Sinden $2,500 for his comments concerning disciplinary actions against the Bruins by National Hocky League President John Ziegler.

"I feel that his personal attacks on President Ziegler have done a disservice both to the Bruins, the NHL and its member clubs," said Mooney. "Harry and I agree his comments were uncalled for."

Mooney's decision was the latest action taken in connection with a brawl last month at New York's Madison Square Garden.

Ziegler suspended three Bruins for leaving the ice rink and fighting with fans following a Dec. 23 game with the New York Rangers. Ziegler took the action against Terry O'Reilly, Peter McNab and Mike Milbury.

"This is not to say that we agree with Ziegler's decisions," said Mooney. "however, we cannot condone this type of comment from a member of this organization."

Sinden called the league president "rat," compared him to a Russian czar and inferred that Ziegler took the action to take pressure off the league and Madison Square Garden in a $7 million lawsuit filed by fans involved in the fight.

Technics

If you want a frequency response with more dynamic range and more high-end extension, you'll want nothing less than metal tape. And for about $380 there are many metal tape decks to choose from. But if you want more than just metal, you'll want what most other comparably priced decks don't give you. The 3 heads and double Dolby† in Technics RS-M63.

The RS-M63's 3-head configuration lets you do what most other comparably priced decks don't: Monitor your recordings while you're recording. And, since our separate HPF record and playback heads are precisely gapped and enclosed in a single housing, you won't get azimuth error. What you will get is an extremely wide frequency response with CrO_2 tape and an incredibly high response with metal tape.

Wow and Flutter	Frequency Response	S/N
0.05% WRMS	20Hz-20kHz(metal) 20Hz-18kHz(FeCr/CrO_2) 20Hz-17kHz(normal)	67 dB Dolby in

As good as that sounds, double Dolby will make it sound even better, because there are separate Dolby circuits for recording and playback. So you can monitor your tapes with the full effects of Dolby Noise Reduction. That means a lot when it comes to accurate recordings.

So do the RS-M63's fluorescent (FL) bar graph meters. Especially when it comes to dynamic range. Because with their device attack time of just 5-millionths of a second, they can respond to the most sudden musical transients.

To help you make the most of all this performance, the RS-M63 has a fine bias adjustment, so you can get the most out of all kinds of tape. And you'll spend more time listening to music and less time searching for it, because we include the memory features you need. Like auto-rewind, auto play and rewind auto play.

Technics RS-M63. The only deck to consider when you consider what you get for the price.

* Recommended price for Technics RS-M63, but actual price will be set by dealers.
† Dolby is a trademark of Dolby Laboratories.

Before you spend $380* on a metal tape deck, make sure it has 3 heads and double Dolby.

IN ONE EAR...

Have you had any news on the excitable boy of late (Zevon, I mean)? I'd like to hear more from, about, whatever. Anyway, thanks. I'm going to sleep.

ANNIE GERARD
COLUMBIA UNIVERSITY

P.S.: I looked all over for your crude contraception ads — where are they?

Zevon's Bad Luck Streak in Dancing School will emerge about the time you read this; as for those ads, one ran in the October, another in the November issue.

As a Plasmatics fan, I thank you for the brief mention in the December Ampersand. However, it's rather f----d up of you to write that their music is "uniformly awful." Punk music may not be what your reviewer regularly listens to, but it's certainly my favorite noise, and I can tell you that the Plasmatics play excellent punk rock.

W.O.W.'s overt sexuality may offend the ignorant masses, but I find the covert sexuality that infuses American culture (e.g., T.V. shows with jiggle factor appeal, suggestive disco album covers, and advertising as a whole) much more offensive.

M. CLARKE
SAN FRANCISCO, CA

Martin Clifford's stereo article in your November issue would have been more aptly titled "Shovelling It in Both Ears." Is he really suggesting that a side-by-side comparison of speakers in a dealer's demo room is a useless test? If so, he must have chosen some interesting gear for himself (if he does indeed have his own stereo) by relying on "manufacturer's promises."

MATTHEW CUSTER
CHAMPAIGN, IL

If Bonnie Raitt would work as hard at finding a "cause" to believe in as she does at making good music she wouldn't have had to wait so long after Vietnam. After reading your December story on her I am surprised that she had enough energy to organize the MUSE concerts. She obviously hasn't had the strength to turn past the front page of her newspaper in several years; it took a headline like Three Mile Island to get her attention.

What's going on? Has everyone forgotten the refineries that "belch smoke into the sky," the coal mines that "doom our miners to an early grave," and all the other phrases of not long ago? You Coast people (East and West) make me sick. You drove the energy companies crazy with your protests and petitions back when environmentalism was the fad, and now you've moved on to protest nuclear energy. Well, we still have those coal mines. Men still die in them. We still have those refineries. I choke on their fumes!

I was raised in Texas and now I'm in school in Oklahoma. I'm the one that has to smell the smoke of the refineries. In September a young child was killed when a petroleum storage tank blew up near her house in Wynnewood, OK, just 50 miles south of here. She DIED! Who's next, me? My parents? My little sister? Yes, we will need more dams if we stop building nuclear stations. Yes, solar energy does work, but can we run our industries on it? As a mechanical engineering major and a member of the Oklahoma Solar Energy Association, I can answer that one: NO WAY. Advanced solar engineering techniques for huge factories are still in the future; it'll be my job to develop them.

I suggest Bonnie and her friends take energy conservation and home solar practices as their cause and stop trying to tear down the systems that generate the electricity for thousands of American stereos that play her albums.

ANDY TAYLOR
UNIVERSITY OF OKLAHOMA

I just finished reading the December 1979 issue of your fabulous magazine and found it to be interesting, provocative and full of information (as usual). But in this issue, I was very disappointed in your biased treatment of nuclear energy.

On the cover was the statement, "No Nukes Is Good News" and just two pages into the magazine there was a full page ad for the new album, No Nukes. Then, in the Bonnie Raitt interview, twenty-five percent of the article was devoted to her opposition to nuclear energy. Why wasn't an authority on nuclear power consulted to give an opposing viewpoint in another article? Why ruin all of the fine news on music with your slanted views?

I am currently enrolled at Purdue University in a double major, Biochemistry and Pre-med. This would seem to suggest that I'm concerned with the health and well-being of people. But I am an ardent supporter of nuclear energy, which I feel is less of a safety hazard than autos, drugs or alcohol. Please, desist in your unfair treatment of "Nukes" for the benefit of us all.

JONATHAN T. AGEE
WEST LAFAYETTE, IN

Ever since the release of the movie Breaking Away, I have been cursing movie reviewers for their ignorant references to a fictitious institution called "the University of Indiana." I was chagrined to see the same "oversight" in an unobtrusive list of new contributors on page four of the December Ampersand. So Terry Gioe is a med student at the aforementioned University of Indiana, is he? In so claiming, the Ampersand copy desk has relegated Mister Gioe to the Twilight Zone. I strongly suspect he's actually alive and well and attending Indiana University. (We're the ones with the basketball team, remember?).

SANDY CLEM
INDIANA UNIVERSITY

Yes, we know that now; Gioe has already complained. God, we're sorry; we're so sorry, you can't imagine how sorry we are. Real sorry.

Come on, Ampersand! Where is your class? Your cheap shot at Norman, OK, is uncalled for and unappreciated.

1980 HAPPY NEW YEAR

One of the many Happy New Year Ampersands of the Month, this is by Rebecca McLaughlin of Greenbelt, Maryland, a graduate student in film at the U. of Md. She earns $25, as can any clever, artistic genius who devises a unique Ampersand, neatly, using black ink (no ballpoint) on stiff white paper.

Attention Michael Upham and Mark J. Wagner: send us your current addresses so that we may pay you.

I can't help but worry about the future of your magazine (which, I might add, up until now I had looked forward to each month with great anticipation) when I begin to find such blights on your pages.

MARGARET FRENCH
UNIVERSITY OF OKLAHOMA

Whaddaya mean, blights? We said 4-H badges seemed more suited to Norman, Oklahoma than pasties, glitter and other Kiss accoutrements. 4-H badges are wholesome and good; why, Ampersand*'s editor-in-chief owns several from her misspent youth. Where do you come off knocking 4-H? Are you an American?*

You too can curse us, praise us, and squeeze us, but do it in letter form, please. Send complaints, opinions, questions to In One Ear, 1680 N. Vine Street #201, Hollywood, CA 90028.

MEMOREX HIGH BIAS TEST NO. 2.

WHICH HIGH BIAS TAPE WINS WITH "LUCILLE"?

Select any blues solo where B.B. King really lets "Lucille" sing, and record it on your favorite high bias tape.

Now record the same solo on MEMOREX HIGH BIAS tape, and listen to the two tapes back to back.

We're convinced you'll have a new favorite for two important reasons:

1. At standard record levels, no high bias tape has a flatter response across the entire frequency range.
2. The signal/noise ratio of MEMOREX HIGH BIAS is unsurpassed by any other high bias tape at the critical high end.

In short, you can't find a high bias cassette that gives you truer reproduction. And, after all, isn't that what you buy a high bias tape for?

Is it live, or is it MEMOREX®

The legendary "Lucille" is a Gibson ES 355 made especially for B.B. King.

For unbeatable performance in a normal bias tape, look for Memorex with MRX$_3$ Oxide in the black package.

& OUT THE OTHER

Future Terror

GOOD NEWS, horror freaks, we won't have to wait another ten years for George Romero's next film. It won't be his promised third in the trilogy of Living Dead zombies (after Night of the Living Dead and Dawn of the Dead), but don't despair, he'll still be terrifying and revolting. Romero will direct films based on horror fantasy novelist Stephen King's books The Stand and Creepshow. King also wrote Carrie, Salem's Lot and The Shining (latter due from Stanley Kubrick this year); Dead Zone, his latest, has taken up residence on several national best seller charts. About this collaboration King has supposedly said, "George and I want to see if it's possible to just scare people. Big time fear!"

Fox Woman

SHERRY LANSING is the first woman ever to hold the position of President of a major film company – 20th Century Fox, where she is now in charge of film production operations. Lansing, 35, a former actress and math teacher, was senior vice president at Columbia Pictures until last November; while there, Lansing supervised production of The China Syndrome and Kramer vs. Kramer. At Fox she replaces Sandy Lieberson, who was hired only last August to replace Alan Ladd, Jr. who, with several other execs, bolted Fox to form his own company. For awhile it seemed the only people left at the studio were the switchboard operators.

Rock On

BECAUSE THEY LIKED his version of the classic Barrett Strong rocker "Money," New Year's Eve fans at the Starwood in Los Angeles showered Tulsa rock near-star Dwight Twilley with handfuls of the real stuff. Added up to $30.00 at daybreak. Which is probably more than he got from the Starwood.

THIN LIZZIE gets a little fatter: after Gary Moore was kicked out of the group last year, Midge Ure filled in for the duration of the tour, altho his heart – and his contract – committed him to Ultravox! Lizzie now has a relatively permanent replacement in Snowy White, familiar to some from Pink Floyd. Ure, meanwhile, is moonlighting from Ultravox as sometime keyboarder with Thin Lizzie, and Phil Lynott, who never left Lizzie, will make a solo album.

America the Beaut

FUNNYMAN STAN FREBERG (perpetrator of hit novelty records in the Fifties like "Day-O" and "Payola Roll Blues") is supposedly set to make a film of his album, The United States of America, a late-Fifties bit of genius called a "satirical revue especially created for records," words and music by Freberg; the album contains unforgettable ditties like "Take an Indian to Lunch This Week," "Top Hat, White Feather and Tail" and many more. It even had tap dancing. Although Freberg intended a three-part history of America he made no subsequent installments.

Detecting

FREDERICK FORREST, the handsome hulk in Bette Midler's bed in The Rose, will star as Hammett, after the book of the same name that has mystery writer Dashiell Hammett solving an off-page mystery... Audrey Hepburn, Ben Gazzara and John Ritter (now there's a trio) will star in They All Laughed, about three private detectives in New York "on an unusual assignment." Written, produced, and directed by Peter Bogdanovich, who hasn't had a hit since Paper Moon in 1973... Jeff Goldblum, who made a big impression in Invasion of the Body Snatchers, will star with Ben Vereen in an ABC-TV series called Tenspeed and Brownshoe, about two unlikely partners in a detective agency (and it's reportedly good. On ABC?)

Casting Pearls

BO DEREK (ha! knew that would get your attention) will next appear in Change of Seasons, a college-oriented drama starring Anthony Hopkins and Shirley MacLaine as a professor and wife who swap partners with student Bo and her boyfriend. And hey, college kids, here's yet another movie about college kids: Train to Terror, starring Hart Bochner (from Breaking Away), Jamie Lee Curtis (from Halloween) and Ben Johnson, is about a group of college students who board a New Year's Eve excursion train bound for an unscheduled destination... death (drum roll, please).

Spring Schedules

MAYBE TV will get it right: Guyana: Mystery of the Century, a film based on the Jonestown massacre, was made last year but never released (questions of taste, we're told). Now CBS has announced a miniseries about the same subject, titled The Mad Messiah, starring Powers Booth as Jones; due in the spring.

LOUISE LASSER, of whom not much has been heard since the demise of Mary Hartman, Mary Hartman, will appear on several college campuses this spring. In "An Evening with Louise Lasser," she'll talk about herself, show some film clips, answer questions, etc.

No, God

WE PRAY this isn't a trend: Marty Feldman's new movie, In God We Trust, "wildly irreverent" (if we're lucky), is finished, but it's not the only religious demi-epic comedy on the horizon. John Denver will do a sequel to Oh, God, titled Oh God, Oh God; Wholly Moses will take on the Old Testament, and K-God, a wretched low-budget quickie, deals with a religious television station. Two serious religious movies also loom: Resurrection, starring Ellen Burstyn and Sam Shepard, and Revelations, with Sally Field. For us, we'll find a rerun of Life of Brian, thanks all the same.

Never, Never Land

THAT'S NO ROBOT, that's my wife: Barry Ira Geller, who's written the screenplay for the film version (he'll also produce) of Roger Zelazny's Lord of Light, isn't content merely to make a science fiction film; his is gonna be huge! So huge the sets will end up as a theme park near Denver, Colorado, called Science Fiction Land, and the whole schmear, movie and park, will supposedly cost more than $450 million – $400 million for the park and $50 million for the flick. The park, three times the size of Disneyland, will feature rides, holographic structures, a bullet train and assorted dinner theaters. Beam us down and out.

Our Town

SIGHTED ON Santa Monica Boulevard, somewhere between the Tropicana Motel and Flipper's Roller Boogie Palace: a gay roller skater, FM radio headset clamped to his earbones, stylish saddlebags slung over his shoulders, being pulled through a busy intersection by a tan, enormous, galloping Great Dane. You wouldn't see that in Norman, Oklahoma, would you now?

Our Culpa (Again)

IN OUR LAST ISSUE we accused Katherine Orloff, who wrote the Willie Nelson article, of also writing a book called Women in Rock. She didn't write that book; she wrote Rock 'n' Roll Woman, in which she interviewed Ronstadt, Simon, etc. This dreadful error was obviously a pre-holiday prank by one of those elves that's always coming in here and twisting our words.

Glenn Silber Barry Brown

The War in Madison

BY DOUG MOE

In 1948, when Life magazine chose Madison, Wisconsin as America's "best place to live," no one had heard of Viet Nam except missionaries and geography majors. When Viet Nam exploded into prominence, Madison – America's best place to live – soon became a war zone in its own right.

The war in Viet Nam has been the subject of many major motion pictures; now a pair of independent producers have turned the "war" in Madison into a film: a feature-length documentary entitled The War at Home.

Through the use of taped interviews and actual television news films, The War at Home recreates Madison as it was in the Sixties: first tranquil, then torn apart by violence as peaceful anti-war demonstrations erupted into full-scale riots.

The film was co-produced by Glenn Silber and Barry Brown, whose company, Catalyst Films, also produced An American Ism: Joe McCarthy, which was televised by the Public Broadcasting Service (PBS) last April. The War at Home will also air on PBS sometime this spring, but it is now being shown in selected theaters nationwide.

The idea for The War at Home came from Silber, a former University of Wisconsin-Madison film student. Inspiration came in 1973, when Karl Armstrong, an FBI "Ten Most Wanted" alumnus, was coming to trial for the bombing of the Army Math Research Center on the UW-Madison campus.

"I felt there was a media blackout of the Armstrong trial," Silber says. "Not so much in Madison, but nationwide. So I shot a lot of videotape to record it."

Silber then set the project aside for a time, but came back to it in 1975, after seeking advice from other documentary filmmakers. Barry Brown, a young actor-director (he appeared in Joe and Flesh) with roots in the theater, was enlisted, and the two began the long, exhaustive and expensive process of putting together a movie.

"You've got to be willing to gamble," Silber says. "We were poor when we started and got poorer as we went along. I ended up selling my car and even my projector." Another time, Silber was forced to store film in his mother's refrigerator because he lacked the money to process it.

Their early research yielded an important discovery: a former Madison newsman, Blake Kellogg, had donated a large amount of television news film to the Wisconsin State Historical Society. Most of this film was not relevant to the project, but there was some stunning footage of the anti-war riots of 1967-68. This footage – a grim circus of tear gas, Mace and beatings – emerges as the most gripping aspect of The War at Home.

The National Guard facing the enemy in Madison in 1967.

Almost as important as the research was the need to raise money. In this era of $40,000,000 motion picture extravaganzas, the young filmmakers' needs were small, yet Silber says they were forced to spend "an exasperating amount of time raising money." Finally a grant was obtained from the Wisconsin Educational Television Network, and that sparked further donations.

"It seemed like it took forever," Brown says, "but we knew we were onto something good."

Whether the mass audience will agree with Brown is another question. The film was a big hit in Madison, playing to enthusiastic sell-out crowds, but then some in the audience could probably see themselves on the screen. Away from Madison, the "hero" status accorded the anti-war demonstrators – who did their share of trashing and looting – might not be so well received. Silber, though, denies this suggestion.

"We think the film has a balance," he says. "We think it is an honest film. Of course, all films are biased to a certain extent – everyone has their own point-of-view."

The list of those interviewed for The War at Home reads like a Who's Who of the Midwest anti-war movement. Former Madison mayor Paul Soglin and his aide Jim Rowen each tell a large part of the tale. Nationally, among those featured in film clips are Ted Kennedy (heckled relentlessly in a speech in Madison), Hubert Humphrey and Robert McNamara.

The most controversial figure interviewed is Karl Armstrong, still in prison for the 1970 bombing of the Army Math Research Center – an ill-fated protest which resulted in the death of a young researcher (whose name is never mentioned in the film).

Brown explains, "I think Karl is an heroic figure. He's a symbol to many people. He was striking back – what he did was what a lot of people felt."

With six years invested in their film, Silber and Brown obviously have high hopes for it on a national level. The film has shown or will be playing in Madison, Milwaukee, Minneapolis, San Francisco, Boston, Chicago (at the Chicago International Film Festival), and Washington, D.C., where it will play at the American Film Institute to commemorate the tenth anniversary of the national moratorium against the war. In addition, 60 Minutes recently approached Silber about a possible segment showcasing the film (for which Catalyst would receive a cool $50,000).

Already, the two mainsprings of Catalyst Films are casting an eye to the future. Brown is leaning toward filming a comedy, while Silber speaks of attempting a "docudrama" based on the Progressive magazine case. (Perhaps they could float a comedy about the First Amendment?)

For now, of course, their main concern is The War at Home. Making a film is one thing, selling it to the public another. Especially a film concerned with one of the blackest periods of our recent history.

William F. Buckley once remarked that the Sixties, as a decade, ran from 1965-1974. Not coincidentally, those are the years at the heart of The War at Home, a worthy attempt to catch an unforgettable decade on film.

Heart Breaks, Heart Aches

BY MARK CHRISTENSEN

CLYDE KELLER

"Uhm... what you hear is not clean. No. But very dirty. Just an illusion of cleanliness." Kelly Curtis, the diminutive and articulate lieutenant manager of the redoubtable Heart, looks past the bullet hole in his office window and out to the sidewalk where two kids on ponyback are delivering a copy of the Seattle Times. Curtis is bent over a portable tape machine the size of a shoebox, playing some pretty nervy rock and roll, early recordings from Heart's new album. It is winter outside and when one of the stocky brown newsponies turns its long head to look in at Kelly Curtis, its breath jets from a nostril and steams the window.

Kelly looks up. He's got about a million things going at once. His phone rings and rings. He punches the recorder off and picks up the receiver. Seconds pass. "Yeah... yeah... no... maybe... look, man, really, I'd like to help you but right now things are too far behind. Ann and Nancy have been havin' terrible problems with their boyfriends, we're gettin' pressure from the execs, from the producer, from the money guys, from their parents, from everybody. We got an album to get out and we're way behind. Too much stuff is happening too fast... yeah... 'kay... bye." He drops the receiver back on its cradle and says, "Now where was I?"

I say, "The new tape."

"Yeah." He nods and punches the machine back on. We hear "Break."

"... there's a crack in the plan, after a while there just ain't no more Magic Man, I gotta need I gotta know, tell me the truth who is running this show?"

That's the dark and impetuous Ann Wilson singing, fans. Now that Grace Slick has been dry gulched by either booze or boredom, Ms. Wilson can lay honest claim to being the greatest WASP woman belter alive. Too, her ensemble Heart is nothing if not the greatest bar band under the NATO umbrella and, if judgment is possible on basis of four tapes culled from their recording sessions this fall, their latest album may eclipse even their epochal debut effort, Dreamboat Annie.

But about those lyrics. "That's kind of a touchy subject," Kelly concedes. "When you talk to Ann I'd handle it with care." You see, the problem is, there is a Magic Man. The creature exists. In the form of either Michael or Roger Fisher, Michael having formerly served as Annie's beau and his brother Roger having left Nancy Wilson's side months ago and the band itself only a few weeks ago.

To complicate matters, Ann's slender, extra-comely younger sister Nancy—a woman who looks like all of Charlie's Angels put together—just broke up with her current boyfriend also. He's Mike Derosier, Heart's drummer. Nancy is the band's mainstay on rhythm guitar and, the Mary Hartman aspects of the Wilson's dilemmas notwithstanding, my next question is inevitable.

Hearing it, Curtis shakes his head. "No. No way. All this emotional stuff will not affect the health of the band. The band's changing, but it's as healthy as ever. Mike's here and Roger's gone, but his leaving will have no effect on the band or the new album. Listen." He turns up the volume on the tape. "This doesn't sound clean, like I said, because it's a dirty unfinished recording. What it really sounds is live and energetic, not clean at all." We sit and listen to "Bebé Le Strange," the album's title cut. It's a rocker, the guitar work steely, dynamic and unadorned. True, there is evidence of Heart's repetitive signature; the band tends to cannibalize its past now and then, but by and large this tape is a killer.

"The cop told the guy: Okay, so religion didn't work, rock and roll didn't work, so try a beer." Ann Wilson, rock torch, is seated in the lobby of Kaye Smith Studios in downtown Seattle. Elbows on knees, chin on palms, she's telling a story of suspense: how a couple of years ago when the band was on tour and staying in a hotel room in "Somewhere, USA," she got a call from the police in New York City. A "white male Caucasian" was holding his mom at knifepoint and was threatening to slit her throat unless he got to talk to Ann in person. Or at least over the phone. It seems he had plans for her. Big plans. He's divined that she was to be his White Witch. And Nancy was the Black Witch. Or something like that. "Anyway," Ann explains, "the police had a priest there, but the priest couldn't reason with the guy. So one of the cops offered him a beer and that calmed him down. Cop talk is funny, though. The way they described him to me. Not as a guy. Not as a nut. But," she leans forward, "as a white, male, Caucasian."

In the studio's lobby we are surrounded by totems of Heart's past success. Gold records galore. Their first album, Dreamboat Annie, went—in the argot of the trade—"triple platinum." Their next, Little Queen, sold two million copies, and their third effort, Magazine, an album that was released against their wishes, sold over a million copies within three weeks of its release in April 1978. Dog and Butterfly followed, shipping, as they say, solid gold. With more than fifty people in their direct employ and with more than ten million records sold, Heart has it made.

Earlier Curtis had showed me slides of the band members Mission Impossible style. They appeared individually on a screen in a conference room above the recording studio. First, drummer Mike Derosier. Tall, woolly headed, handsome, he has the build of a small forward in the NBA. He's a nice guy, a collector of cars. He nearly got killed a couple of months ago when the band was touring in Japan. Part of Heart's stage roofing fell on his head during a concert. He's been with the band since 1975.

Next, bass player Steve Fossen. Fossen has the kind of hipless pencil-slender physique that seems common only to rock and roll musicians. A founder of the original band, he's taken Heart's success in stride. "It's made me even with the world; I've been able to pay my debts and enjoy myself."

Then Howard Leese. For this photo session Howard wears a tight shiny jump suit that reveals a large part of his somewhat chubby chest and stomach. Howard's got long, lank blond hair and is a little slack jawed, so he looks like a Batman's jaded, faded cousin from Miami Beach. Within the group, however, Leese draws tremendous respect. The master of Heart's now extremely complicated keyboard setup, Leese is largely responsible for taking lyrics and melodies provided by Ann and Nancy and translating them instrumentally. Musically, he is the band's prime organizer.

Now for the sisters themselves. Stand back. Ann appears on the screen, twice life size, dolled up like a three-hundred-dollar hooker. She mugs. Her lips are crimson. A steep V of cleavage is revealed. Something else, too: real gravity. This woman looks strong like bool! And Heart is, as the rock press tells us, Annie's band.

Nancy's last on the screen. Whether in person or on camera, she's a knockout; she has the angelic, almost deadpan features of a younger Jean Shrimpton. Even without a hundredweight of cosmetics troweled on their mugs, these women look like a Hollywood glamour rock wet dream come true. They're stunners.

Heart is a white, middle-class American music phenomenon of the first water. The Wilson sisters, both healthy, Vogue magazine-good looking, polite and probably sane, are, in fact, a weird affirmation of life in suburbia, just as Ricky and David Nelson were a half generation ago. All of Heart's current members grew up in the bucks-up bedroom communities surrounding Seattle.

Asked how she defined her initial success, Ann rejoins, "Being able to pay cash for a Porsche." She adds that one of her future plans is to "write a rock and roll novel that portrays people in the business honestly. Not all as a bunch of degenerate, decadent pill-popping jerks." Then it's safe to say that she spends little time putting money up her nose or, God Forbid! in her arm.

She laughs and her eyes go extravagantly round. "Money up my nose? In my arm? Wouldn't that hurt? No, that's not for me. I've got too many other things to do. It took us a long time to get where we are and none of us want to blow it."

The band began as the Army in 1963 and consisted of bassist Steve Fossen and the Fisher Bros. They were high school dance specialists who ascended to the saloons as soon as most of the members were old enough to drink. The Army became White Heart and finally, circa 1967, Heart. They drew on Led Zeppelin, the Stones, the Yardbirds, the Kinks, et al. The Fords and General Motors of British rock. The Wilson sisters

Look Back in Angst

GOODBYE SEVENTIES

Now that everyone else has retraced, retrod and reconsidered the Seventies, it's our turn. Herewith, our observations and remembrances of that decade of yore, those ten years that seemed like twenty, so dull while they were happening and so fascinating now that they're gone. Well, some of it was fascinating: it was an eventful decade for politics, a snore for entertainment; our cars got smaller, our movies bigger, the dollar got very small, and music became an anaesthetic. So, in no particular order, we bid a relieved farewell. The Eighties will have to be better, right? Right?

MOVIES

Not such a hot decade for black films, what with Blaxploitation flicks like Shaft, Superfly, and Blackula; Mahogany, The Wiz and Lady Sings the Blues gave Diana Ross something to do; and Claudine, Sounder and The Great White Hope were exceptional exceptions.

Special effects in films became ever bigger, more dazzling, gorier. The "What's left?" salute to Star Wars, Carrie, Alien, Jaws, Apocalypse Now, Close Encounters of the Third Kind, Star Trek, The Black Hole, The Exorcist, The Omen, ad nauseum.

The Seventies also marked the first time pornography became chic, evolving a whole new subculture of suckers and -uckers like Linda Lovelace of Deep Throat and Marilyn Chambers of Behind the Green Door, not to mention gaping-pink photographs in Hustler, Chic, Penthouse, Gallery, Viva, Oui, Club, and even venerable Playboy. For them all, a large, curly, perma-placqued pubic hair.

And, dare we forget, the Seventies gave us a new cinematic genre, the Disaster Movie, starting with Airport in '70 and continuing with Airport 75, Airport '77 and Airport '79 – Concorde, plus The Poseidon Adventure, Beyond the Poseidon Adventure, The Towering Inferno, Swarm, Earthquake, Hurricane... but we survived them all.

PINTO EXPLODING GAS TANK AWARD

To Three Mile Island, the Mexican oil spill, Japanese and Russian whalers, the Big Four auto companies for failing to meet air pollution standards, and the Canadian government for refusing to curb slaughter of baby seals.

BOOKS

We wanted to improve ourselves and we bought the books to prove it: Any Woman Can, Joy of Sex, Total Fitness in 30 Minutes a Week, Winning Through Intimidation; I'm OK, You're Ok; TM; The Total Woman; How to Be Your Own Best Friend; Open Marriage; Everything You Always Wanted to Know About Sex (But Were Afraid to Ask). And more, but we're afraid to remember.

For the first time, we read something called the fictionalized novel (also known as Twisting the Truth for One's Own Ends), in which real people were casually mixed in with made-up people; Ragtime did it first, followed by a glut including The 7 Per Cent Solution, Hammett, Beecher, The Public Burning, The Executioner's Song and most recently, The Brethren. Plus a few others we don't or won't remember.

Novels earned millions for paperback rights, starting with E.L. Doctorow's Ragtime (purchased for $1.5 million, it then had the bad taste to bomb in softcover); at decade's end, the record paperback sale was held by Princess Daisy, $3.4 million, which has yet to be written by Judith (Scruples) Krantz. Seventies hardcover biggies: Jonathan Livingston Seagull, Love Story, Bermuda Triangle, Looking for Mr. Goodbar, Passages, Jaws... no wonder the illiteracy rate is climbing.

Record of the Decade: Sticky Fingers by the Rolling Stones.

Runners up: Hotel California by the Eagles, Layla by Derek & the Dominoes.

Movies of the decade: Godfather I & II.

Song: "Night Moves" by Bob Seger.

Books: The Women's Room, All the President's Men.

Remember: Rolling Stone endorsed Jimmy Carter in 1976.

Outstanding terrorist groups (four-way tie): the IRA, the Red Brigade, Baader-Meinhof, the PLO. Runners-up: Symbionese Liberation Army, Ku Klux Klan.

Most boring fugitive of 1974: Patty Hearst.

Worst new cocktail: Jonestown Punch.

Best Compromise solution: send them half the Shah.

Worst diseases: Swine flu, Spiro Agnew.

Most mileage from one comedy routine: Steve Martin.

Most mileage from one tomb: King Tut.

Most mileage from one word: Robin "Nanoo" Williams

WILL WESTON

But things weren't all bad: we don't have Nixon to kick around anymore. If we're lucky.

LET THEM EAT CAKE

The major American oil companies logged an 89 per cent overall profit increase over the decade; the American and Canadian paper industries had a 60 per cent profit increase; the late Emperor Bokassa of the Central African Empire, bankrupted his country for his extravagant coronation; and good old OPEC keeps barreling along.

TV OR NOT TV

Television gave us a few firsts these past ten years: the mini-series, which began with Leon Uris' QB VII, went on to Roots and Roots, the Next Generation; The Scarlet Letter on PBS; Rich Man, Poor Man; Backstairs at the White House and seemingly dozens more (with dozens more to come). We were also served the docu-drama as a new TV form, as in The Search for Patty Hearst, The Scottsboro Boys, Dummy, The Raid on Entebbe, The Missiles of October, Tail Gunner Joe, The Pueblo Incident, et al. But best of all, the British came through with Masterpiece Theatre (Upstairs, Downstairs; Poldark; The Forsythe Saga; I, Claudius; etc.) and the Shakespeare plays. The flowering of PBS, in fact, is probably the single cheeriest note in TV's past ten years; it more than makes up for ABC's dominance of the ratings with Laverne & Shirley, Three's Company, Charlie's Angels and similar trash.

MUSIC

There was no Next Big Thing in music. No new Elvis, no new Beatles. No one artist or group to characterize the decade. Music had its share of spectaculars, too, when flashing lights, fogbanks and sheer tonnage of equipment pounded us into submission (oh, there was music too?). To Kiss; Emerson, Lake and Palmer; Earth, Wind and Fire; ELO; Alice Cooper and others, the "Enough Already" award.

70'S STATUS SYMBOLS

Mercedes 450 SL (chocolate brown), cocaine, designer jeans, gold chains, $50 haircuts, Gucci, digital watches that require two hands to find the time, Perrier, Betamax.

Event most likely to characterize the decade in the history books: Nixon's Resignation. Event most likely to live in infamy: Gerald Ford's pardon of Richard Nixon.

Hey we're not selfish; we're sharing this end-of-the-decade silliness with our contributors and assorted college newspaper entertainment editors. We asked the former to give us the Decade's Ten-or-so Best in six different categories; from the editors we requested 25-words-or-less essays on what the Seventies meant to them. Sixteen contributors from both coasts and in between found their mailboxes in time; of the paltry six essays that arrived, four were from Oklahoma. Must have something to do with the absence of 4-H activities in that state.

Contributors' Picks

Albums

This category elicited no less than 125 album titles, proving – as do the subsequent categories – that our contributors are an independent lot with diverse (one might even say scattered) tastes. The most-listed album: Born to Run by Bruce Springsteen (six people agreed on it). Runners up: Blood on the Tracks by Dylan, Dark Side of the Moon by Pink Floyd and Never Mind the Bollocks, Here's the Sex Pistols (four each). Only one vote for Rumours and two for the Saturday Night Fever soundtrack (so who's buying all those records?).

Recording Artists

Ninety-one artists were listed, and it's a three-way tie: Bruce Springsteen, Rolling Stones and the Who, 7 votes each. Elvis Costello and Brian Eno earned five each; Bowie, Dylan, Iggy Pop and the Sex Pistols chalked up four each.

Personalities

not actors or recording artists

Pretty dismal, folks. Of the 93 people listed, Muhammad Ali wins with 6 votes, followed by a second place tie between Howard Cosell and Richard Nixon.

One contributor nominated his father in this category (aw); still another mentioned his Pet Rock, another the Pillsbury Doughboy...it was a lousy decade.

Actors

Only 64 nominations here, Jane Fonda the clear winner with 10, followed by Jack Nicholson, 9, and Dustin Hoffman and Al Pacino and Robert De Niro, 7 each. Nixon received one vote in this category, as did Morris the cat.

Films

No surprises here, either. Annie Hall took top honors with 9 votes, followed by Manhattan, 6; and Godfather I, 5. Godfather II, Star Wars and Clockwork Orange earned four each out of the 79 films listed.

Events

The current event always looms larger than the old, so the Iran crisis wins here, with ten votes (only 55 events were tendered, making this the least inspiring category). Watergate and Three Mile Island came in second with 9, and the U.S. withdrawal from Viet Nam received 8. One contributor thought Woody Hayes belting one of his players was significant, and another mourned the defeat of the Cubs.

Sound System Perfection:

Parties, Consoles & Future Fidelity

Remember consoles? They are the dinosaurs of audio — those great hunks of cherry or mahogany furniture that your parents had in the living room years ago — maybe they still do. It played music which sounded okay then, until years later when a friend picked up a component system and we discovered hot sound came from separate little packages.

Component high fidelity was born because a few clever technicians and music lovers realized that the best way to reproduce music was by making a separate, specialized component for each link in the audio chain. Consoles just didn't cut it because the specs weren't up to par and stereo separation was dismal with the speakers built into one huge cabinet. So if we wanted a good turntable, we bought one from a manufacturer who specialized in turntables. Likewise, a receiver or amplifier was purchased from a specialist in these areas, while speakers came from a company that devoted all its time and resources to designing and building speakers, and a cartridge came from a cartridge specialist. Put them all together and we had a wonderful system that reproduced music with a clarity and forcefulness that no console or compact could ever aspire to.

A great deal of audio advertising today pushes complete component systems where each unit is manufactured by the same company. They're housed in a rather nice wood and glass cabinet, or rack, the amplifier and tuner inside, the turntable on top and the speakers separated. Such systems are essentially consoles updated.

An important difference is that they are still separate components, merely sharing a common home — the rack — and the speakers are not buried within some monolithic piece of furniture. But all the same, doesn't it go against the premise of component hi fi — to buy a component from the specialist in that area? Yes, it does. But is that bad? No, it's not!

Pre-packaged systems from one manufacturer — some call them ensembles — have been available for nearly two years. Most come from the large Japanese companies who are now able to offer products in every component category because of advances in audio technology in the past few years and the vast resources these firms can commit to producing audio components.

They cover a wide range of prices, usually starting around $550 and reaching beyond $1000, sometimes up to $1500. Practically all include separates — integrated amplifier and tuner — rather than receivers. A base unit also includes a turntable, two speakers and a rack. As prices rise so do power rating and features, and about mid-way through most suppliers' lines a cassette deck is added. Most of the racks include record storage space.

So why buy a pre-packaged system? Because it's easy, no other reason. It involves a minimum of decision making, no anxieties. Name your price, and give a listen. You like it, you buy it. That's all. In terms of performance or quality, there is absolutely no reason for not buying one of these systems. As is always the case with audio gear, the best way to judge is with your ears. Pour over the spec sheets for any of the packaged components; they compare favorably with any bought separately. Let's face it, the state of audio technology has advanced to the point where unless you're a golden-eared audiophile nearly every component auditioned will provide good, clean sound.

Such systems exist simply for marketing reasons. Manufacturers of components are in business to make money — nothing wrong with that. Assembling systems themselves is just one way of marketing their products, a method designed to reach a segment of the market they might otherwise miss. You may be willing to spend time at the local stereo shop fussing with the components, trying this and tinkering with that, but not everybody is. Many people prefer shopping in a department store, or through a mail order house. By assembling component systems for these customers, companies stand a better chance of increasing their business, reaching out beyond their traditional customers.

There are still features or types of components which just are not available in any of the packaged systems. For instance, few full-line Japanese companies make record changers these days. So if we want to stack our records, we assemble the system ourselves, or opt for one of the mixed systems put together by many retailers. Similarly, there will be other features or special requirements, speaker size for another, which just can't be met with any of the manufacturer-assembled systems.

Minor objections? Right. That's the point. Pre-packaged systems will satisfy the vast majority of hi fi shoppers in terms of performance. The console has come of age.

Expanding the Sound

The concept of a hi-fi system has been with us for a long time. The general idea is that it should consist of a receiver or its equivalent in the form of a tuner-amplifier combination, and, in either case, followed by a pair of speakers. To this basic system we add other components such as a record player, cassette deck and earphones.

The problem with this concept is that it's wrong. Any system built along these lines is incomplete and so is the music it produces.

There are two fallacies here and they are serious ones indeed if we are to have true replicas of live music transported electronically to our listening rooms.

The first of these involves dynamic range. Dynamic range is the sonic distance between the softest sound we can hear to the loudest our ears can tolerate, possibly extending from the gentlest tone of a single flute to the total sound of a rock group going full tilt. We can hear it live, but reproducing it electronically in our homes is another matter.

To make a phono record, music is first put on tape, which is used as a master. The sound is then transferred to discs. To avoid distortion the taped sound must be restricted, its dynamic range reduced, often by as much as 33%. This is known as sound compression, the recording engineer's acknowledgment of the limited capabilities of magnetic tape.

As a further aural offense, the sound may be compressed still more when transferred to phono records. Here the movement of the cutting stylus used in making the record must also be restricted. The louder the sound the wider the groove, but in turn, this means fewer grooves in a limited space. So loud musical passages are necessarily confined and, as in the case of tape, dynamic range is limited. So whether we buy records and tapes, or whether we listen to them via broadcasts, what we get is a weakened rendition of what we would hear when music is played live.

The same sad dynamic range restriction also applies to so-called live broadcasting. In either AM or FM, the strength of the audio signal used to modulate the carrier wave that brings the music to our receiver must be compressed to prevent overmodulation and resulting distortion.

The solution is to add a dynamic range expander to the incomplete hi-fi system. Dbx makes several which expand all frequencies and all levels over the entire range, reversing the effects of the compression process and doing so linearly. We can be sure of one thing. We'll hear more music the way it is played, plus an unexpected benefit. Less noise.

That's only part of the story. In the listening room we are low men on the totem pole. What we hear is what is left over after the room gets through with the music. Everything absorbs sound to a greater or lesser degree, depending on the materials. Walls, rugs, drapes, cushions, floors, human beings — all soak up sound. Unfortunately, this sound absorption is frequency selective, so everything in the listening room is like a large collection of tone controls gone mad. The hi-fi system may have a uniform frequency response but what we hear after the listening room gets through with the sound is acoustic chaos.

Oddly, open windows contribute nothing to our enjoyment of electronically reproduced sound. With one or more open windows, the sound goes sailing through without benenfit to us. Some of the audio energy we've spent money to produce is literally out of the window. Part of the enjoyment of music is reverberation from walls, floor and ceiling. That's why open air concerts aren't as enjoyable as those in enclosed auditoriums. Same idea as an open window listening room, except that an open air concert is all windows, with little chance for reverberation.

To get back some measure of control, add a graphic equalizer to the hi-fi setup. An equalizer is similar to the tone controls we use, but divides the audio spectrum into much finer sections, with a controllable amount of amplificationfor each. A five band equalizer divides the audio spectrum into bands that are two octaves; a ten band divides the audio into one octave sections, but costs more. We can use the equalizer to compensate for the various sound absorptions taking place, giving our ears a chance to hear the music as it should be heard.

What all this means, then, is that we should expand our concept of a hi-fi system. To be complete it needs a dynamic range expander and an equalizer. At least this gives us a fighting chance to hear music closer to 'live.'

Make the Party Jump, Not the Needle

When it's time to party down, will your stereo stand up? A few set-up techniques can make your sound system the equal of almost any party environment.

First, try hooking up two record players so the music can continue uninterrupted from one record right into the next. A mixer-fader is fine for this, but if you don't have one, a facile-fingered record player operator can do the trick. You can use records right out of your collection, but disco records are better. These are workhorses and can take punishment. Consult disco charts in disco or music magazines or your local record shop can advise you or may have listings from which you can make selections.

Since you will be working with higher than normal gain plus possible floor vibration because of dancing, you may get audio feedback resulting in howling and groove skipping by the stylus. To prevent these, put some soft padding under the turntables. A rubber mat would be fine. And also, because of vibration, set your stylus tracking force higher than you normally would. Three grams wouldn't be excessive.

The music will be in direct competition with usual party sound levels so you will need a power amp capable of delivering audio without straining or excessive distortion. The more speakers used, the higher the power output capability of the amp must be. Use an amp capable of handling several speaker systems simultaneously. The power amp should be able to operate for hours without rest and without blowing its fuses, generally a characteristic of higher power amps that are quality rated. A small fan, blowing directly on the amp, will help keep its operating temperature down.

The speakers should be high efficiency types since these demand less audio power from the amp. They should be small, mounted above head level and pointed downward. Floor speakers take up valuable floor space and get in the way; these, plus the wiring, can trip people. If you must use floor speakers, tack the connecting wires against the baseboard. If the speakers are to be much more than their usual distance from the amp, the connecting wires should be at least one gauge number (preferably two) lower than normal. The lower the gauge number, the thicker the wire.

Put one person in charge of the audio equipment, with a hands-off rule for everyone else. There's always some character at a party who likes to show off his audio knowledge or who thinks it's cute to tamper with the sound controls.

Make a selection of records in advance and arrange them in sequence. Have some more backups in case the party lasts longer than expected. Have a good, safe table or wide shelf set aside just for records. Nobody wants to lose their prized James Brown and the Famous Flames LP to a careless boot heel. You might even make a list of the records, number them, and put this information on a 5x7 card, using both sides. In this way you should be able to find any record in a matter of moments, in case there's a demand for a repeat. Always stay at least one record ahead of the one being played, cuing up on the spare turntable.

If you want the records announced, disc-jockey style, you'll need at least one mike, preferably a cardioid type to keep background noise pickup at a minimum. The operator of the sound system should know how to handle the mike, should be able to project his (or her) personality, and should know how to work the sound level controls so as to have her (or his) voice override the music.

Position the audio equipment as close to an outlet as possible. The connecting line cord should be completely out of the way so no one trips over it and so it isn't accidentally pulled out of its socket. Try to find a corner spot, away from people traffic, for the record players, mixer-fader and mike.

Make a trial run to make sure everything is working, that the sound level is high enough, is well dispersed and can be heard throughout. This will give the sound operator some idea of expected control settings.

Technics

With all the receivers to choose from, how do you make the right choice? By comparing power, performance and price. It's the only meaningful way to tell how much receiver you're getting for your money. So compare.

Specifications	SA-101	SA-202	SA-303	SA-404	SA-505
Suggested Retail Price	$180	$220	$280	$350	$420
RMS Power Per Channel (rated bandwidth)	18 watts (40 to 20,000 Hz)	30 watts (30 to 20,000 Hz)	40 watts (20 to 20,000 Hz)	50 watts (20 to 20,000 Hz)	63 watts (20 to 20,000 Hz)
Rated THD	0.04%	0.04%	0.04%	0.04%	0.04%
FM Sensitivity (50 dB stereo)	38.3 dBf	38.3 dBf	37.2 dBf	37.2 dBf	37.2 dBf
FM Selectivity	65 dB	68 dB	70 dB	70 dB	70 dB

Technics recommended prices, but actual price will be set by dealers.

As you can see, Technics gives you a lot. A lot of power and a lot of performance at a very good price. That's because our receivers have the technology you need. Like hefty transformers and big power capacitors to punch out deep bass notes with authority. Like a dynamic headroom of 1.4 dB which means 38% extra power (above RMS) on sudden musical transients.

Our phono sections are just as impressive. All have a very high S/N ratio, which means that even quiet musical passages come through clearly. Yet each can handle the high voltages generated by today's best records.

And when it comes to FM, all Technics receivers include MOS FET's for high sensitivity and low noise. "Flat Group Delay" IF stages for clean signal processing. And phase-locked-loop circuitry for accurate stereo imaging.

With the SA-404 and the SA-505 (shown below), you also get 10 LED peak-power indicators. And Acoustic Control that gives you more control over both the bass and treble frequencies than is possible with conventional tone controls.

How do you make the right choice? It's simple. Just compare.

Cabinetry is simulated woodgrain

Don't buy any receiver until you compare its power, performance and price to Technics.

Stereo in the 80s

The decade that just ended signalled the maturation of the high fidelity industry and its acceptance by the music lover. The coming decade promises even more profound changes in home entertainment. Herewith, an educated guess of what the music system of the Eighties will look (and sound) like.

Video & Audio

Clearly, the romance between video and audio, begun in the Seventies, will flourish in the coming decade. Technological advances at the TV broadcast end have now made it possible to transmit a more faithful higher fidelity sound signal along with the TV picture. The rest is now up to the makers of TV receivers, some of whom are already boasting about improved audio sections in their products. Owners of both stereo components and TV sets need not wait for better sound or replace their TV sets to achieve such improvements. There are now so-called TV-audio-tuners, such as one made by Pioneer, which can be hooked into unused inputs on a hi-fi system and tuned to TV channel frequencies in much the same way as an FM station. By turning down the TV set's own volume control and flanking the TV screen with stereo speakers, a vast improvement in sound quality is immediately apparent.

That's only the beginning. In Japan, for more than a year now, TV networks have been broadcasting the sound portion of concerts and other events in full stereo. Despite the anomaly of a small screen and a big sound, public enthusiasm there has been great. Stereo TV is still some time away in the United States, where the FCC has to rule regarding which of several techniques should be employed, but it will surely be here before the decade is half over. Incidentally, stereo capability on TV also means bilingual capability, so that we may well see TV programs "dubbed" into other languages for local predominant ethnic groups. A simple front panel switch will select English or the alternate language.

Digital Audio

The most important revolution in audio, however, is already well under way and its benefits will be completely felt in the coming decade. Already available, "digitally mastered" recordings are discs pressed from master tapes using a complex numerical code to represent each instant of music. The character of the musical waveform might have been examined more than 50,000 times per second and its representation on the tape itself was in the form of a number-code similar to that used in computer data storage. Several advantages result from this approach. First, dynamic range — the difference between the softest and loudest musical passages — is no longer limited by the tape's magnetic characteristics. Increasing the numerical detail of the digital code increases dynamic range capability of the system. And since, at best, tape used in the old fashioned way was limited to perhaps 60 or 65 decibels of dynamic range while live music may have a dynamic range of between 85 and 100 dB, the tape medium can for the first time capture the full dynamic range of music without requiring arbitrary compression of the loudest louds and softest softs.

Sometime in the 1980's, the conventional tape recorder or tape deck as we know it may give way to a new type of tape recorder which is based upon digital rather than analog techniques.

The next step in the digital audio revolution will be a totally digital disc. Several companies have already exhibited and demonstrated such discs. Some of them are spin-offs of the video disc already being marketed in a limited way in certain cities of the country, others are strictly audio discs. Some of the proposed discs are tracked by optical means, such as a laser beam, while others resort to conventional, physical tracking of grooves. Over the next few years, all of these systems will probably be market-tested in one form or another and it will more than likely be the public that decides which way the digital audio disc is to go. It should be noted that all of the proposed digital disc systems, just as in the case of digital audio tape recording, would have absolutely flat frequency response to at least 20,000 Hz, harmonic distortion levels bordering on the unmeasurable and no wow-and-flutter.

Obsolescence & Non-Obsolescence

Certainly, some of the components we now use to reproduce music will eventually become obsolete, others will remain useful and essential. Regardless of program source changes (such as digital tape or digital discs) we will still need audio amplifiers and loudspeaker systems, though both of these items may have to handle higher levels of power than they are called upon to do today. If we want radio as a program source, either stereo FM or stereo AM (which will have become standard before the mid-Eighties) we'll still need a radio tuner or receiver much like the hi-fi components used today, but perhaps with the stereo AM circuitry of the future built-in.

The turntable system as we know it may be one of those items slated for eventual obsolescence by the end of the decade (though some point to ownership of old 78-rpm records as proof of the fact that older music sources never die). With the turntable's demise will come the death of the phono cartridge, since other types of pick-ups will be needed for those digital discs. Cassette tape decks are likely to take second place to digital taping systems, and with them will go such noise reduction systems as Dolby and dbx. Microphones, on the other hand, will still be as important as loudspeakers, since each is responsible for the conversion of sound energy to electrical energy or vice versa. In the words of the old vaudevillian, when it comes to audio, "you ain't seen nothin' yet!"

On Screen

KRAMER VS. KRAMER, starring Dustin Hoffman, Meryl Streep and Jane Alexander; written and directed by Robert Benton.

Men leave this film literally crowing, walking with a spring in their step and heads held high. Kramer vs. Kramer makes them feel good, as well it should; I can't remember a more insidiously sexist, pro-male, anti-female film. Kramer vs. Kramer is not just about a divorce and the subsequent custody battle for the child, it is a paean to the wonderfulness of men, here personified by Hoffman, who is such an understanding, sensitive, caring daddy he makes mothers — any mother — look like callous harridans.

And speaking of callous, Streep abandons her son and husband (ah, but tearfully) and then returns 15 months later after "finding herself in California" (was ever a deck so stacked?) to claim custody of her son. How unfair of her, when Hoffman has been fighting so hard to be a good daddy and keep his tough job while she was off finding herself. Yes, it is possible for a father to be as good or better a parent than a mother, but why must writer/director Benton sacrifice a woman to make this point? And what of joint custody, where both parents share equally in raising the child? Benton wants no such logic cluttering his bias; one parent must win and another must lose in order to twist our hearts and squeeze out a few more tears.

The courtroom fight loads the scales even more: when Streep, through her attorney, hits Hoffman below the emotional belt, the sophisticated Hollywood preview audience actually hissed her; and when Hoffman's attorney attempts to browbeat Streep into admitting she'd failed at her marriage, Streep looks at Hoffman, weeping, and he shakes his head, no, Babe, you didn't fail. The man is a saint! He's not real. Jane Alexander, who plays Streep's friend and confidante, turns on her former friend in court and claims Hoffman is the more deserving parent. Not only does this betrayal embody Benton's male ego and his ignorance of female relationships, it is a sure indicator of what Benton thinks women should be: dedicated mothers and wives with no life of their own. Alexander tells Hoffman at one point that she will never remarry, even though she is divorced and her ex-husband is running around with other women, because she feels marriage is forever; she's content to raise her two children, alone.

It's more difficult than it should be to see through Benton's prejudices because the film is so technically perfect; the performances are, unfortunately, convincing; the script is intelligent; and all the emotional buttons are pushed, but none too hard. Our sentiments are manipulated by experts. I was furious while watching Kramer vs. Kramer, but when I left the theater and saw all those men practically dancing away into the night, and heard them cheering and whooping over this, I lost much of my anger. It turned to pity.

Judith Sims

Hollywood 3, Women 0

Kramer vs. Kramer has won the New York and Los Angeles Film Critics awards and is predicted for an Oscar sweep. But if Dustin Hoffman's role had been written for a woman, the movie would be dismissed critically as a feminine soap opera, but since it's Hoffman's movie, about men functioning without women, it is not called a soap opera, it's elevated to the loftier region of "slice of life realism, a modern treatise on changing sexual roles."

Last year, as the decade that nurtured women's liberation drew to a close, independent, questioning women took a beating in movies, from Woody Allen's thoughtful Manhattan to Alan Pakula's condescending Starting Over and Robert Benton's artful Kramer vs. Kramer. These films all reflect a distressing trend: a backlash against women.

In each film, women who seek independence are held up to ridicule. In Manhattan, Diane Keaton is a neurotic, self-absorbed woman who is unable to accept love. In fact, the only "perfect" woman in Manhattan is not a woman at all, but a 17-year-old girl played by Mariel Hemingway. The others are neurotic (Keaton), castrating and lesbian (Meryl Streep) or self-defeating (Anne Bryne).

Starting Over also rakes modern women over the coals. In that comedy Burt Reynold's wife, played by Candice Bergen, kicks him out in favor of a career. But Bergen's ambitions and accomplishments are treated as jokes. We are made to laugh at her, not with her. Our sympathy is with battered Burt, who quickly finds another woman, Jill Clayburgh, the perfect male conception of what a woman should be: bright, but not too smart, her job as a nursery school teacher is not a threatening career. Clayburgh longs for security and marriage; she in nonaggressive and accommodating.

What each of these movies yearns for is a supposedly simpler time when women knew their place. At least Woody Allen has the grace to be baffled by today's changing world; Pakula and Benton are arrogant, they have the answers. Pakula's movie says the right "girl" (just like the one who married dear old dad) is still out there, keep looking; Benton says okay, she's not out there, but don't worry fellas, you don't need her anyway.

It's important to realize that the people who call the shots in Hollywood are male. Very little headway has been made by women. Each of these films was made by men in their 40's and 50's — the same age bracket of the executives in charge of the studios. These are the men who grew up with one set of expectations, then had to readjust their lives to a revolution that made sense intellectually, but not emotionally. These men often feel battered by the accusations of feminists; they do not like being cast as exploiters and since they're in charge of the factory, they're able to dictate the propaganda. In upcoming months, these three films will be joined by Robert Redford's Ordinary People, in which dear old mom (Mary Tyler Moore) is the cause of one son's breakdown and another's suicide.

What is disturbing is not that men want to make fantasy films in which they are heroic (Hoffman's more-sensitive-than-thou character is only a variation on John Wayne's more-masculine-than-thou characters), but that women are embracing the dream instead of waking up to the nightmare. Kramer and Starting Over are enormous successes, which makes one wonder about the so-called strides of women's liberation.

Movies speak to our fantasies, and these movies say that women's fantasies are still dictated by men, are still defined by what men want. This does not bode well for the Eighties.

THE JERK, starring Steve Martin, Bernadette Peters, Catlin Adams, Mabel King; screenplay by Steve Martin, Carl Gottlieb, Michael Elias; directed by Carl Reiner.

Steve Martin is truly a phenomenon of the Seventies, almost single-handedly establishing a new school of comedy rooted in the subtle and obvious incongruities of life. When he's "on," Martin deftly dances that razor-sharp tightrope between helpless humor and outright silliness, between unrestrained hilarity and sheer banality. Unfortunately, in Martin's movie debut, The Jerk, this self-proclaimed wild and crazy funnyman has overstepped his delicate boundary; instead of tickling our funnybones, he insults our intelligence.

Martin plays Navin Johnson, the adopted son of a family of black sharecroppers who finds that he marches to a different beat — or rhythm, as the filmmakers would stereotypically have it — so he leaves home to find fame and fortune.

Eventually, Navin meets an innocent cosmetologist named Marie (Bernadette Peters) and they fall — or in The Jerk's case, stumble — in love. Miss Peters is Martin's off-screen flame, and her appearance in this film is a testament to what people will do for love.

In any event, soon Navin is informed that an eye-glass invention he devised to help a misguided entrepreneur (Bill Macy) has been marketed into a million-dollar commodity.

However, the title of this film, it must be remembered, is The Jerk and not The Genius, so Navin's wealth is short-lived. He's hit with a class action lawsuit filed by a group claiming that Navin's eye-piece invention has damaged their eyesight. The spokesman for the group is Carl Reiner, The Jerk's director, who in this cameo claims the invention harmed his vision to the point where he became a poor director. Reiner must have worn the device while directing The Jerk.

Even for the staunchest Steve Martin fans (I'm one of them), The Jerk is so stupid it would leave an audience of morons clamoring for William F. Buckley... or at the very least Jerry Lewis.

STAR TREK, THE MOTION PICTURE, with William Shatner and Leonard Nimoy; written by Harold Livingston; directed by Robert Wise.

I admit to being a Trekkie-in-training: I usually catch whatever episode of Star Trek is on TV, but I don't plan my life around the adventures of the Enterprise, nor do I consider the exploits of Captain Kirk and company sacrosanct. However, after hearing nothing but disastrous reports about Star Trek, the Motion Picture, I was surprisingly pleased with the outcome, and I think most people who enjoyed the TV series will be as well. Like the series, Star Trek is long on rationality, short on action, heavy on pacifism, light on warfare. It preaches understanding, curiosity and tolerance. Like Close Encounters, Star Trek is eager to have us love the unknown.

This costly epic is quite leisurely and almost uneventful; some might consider it boring. But like a visit home to relatives, Star Trek treats us to the familiar while embracing changes. It is to some degree frozen in the late Sixties mentality: this movie is about a machine that has evolved into near-humanness. Its conclusion says that trust, love and faith count for more than logic, science and fact.

This almost religious fervor is dressed up with impressive special effects; we know where the money went. The same cannot be said for Disney's space patrol, The Black Hole, a dismal science fiction movie which takes one of the most intriguing discoveries of space (black holes) and impoverishes it into banality. The Black Hole is 3½ minutes of special effects in search of a movie. The entire film could be an "E" coupon ride in Tomorrowland.

The eternal triangle: a man, a woman, a horse.

ELECTRIC HORSEMAN, starring Jane Fonda, Robert Redford, Willie Nelson; written by Robert Garland; directed by Sydney Pollack.

If it weren't for Cinemascope and Technicolor flash, this could be a romantic western of the Forties starring John Wayne of Gary Cooper, with Maureen O'Hara or Claudette Colbert. It's iconography at its best and worst, pretty pictures for their own sake. Beautiful Redford, lovely Fonda, a gorgeous racehorse, breathtaking Utah... who cares if the script is dreadful and the actors (except for a fine Willie Nelson debut) mediocre? We want fantasy, they give us fantasy: a once-champion rodeo star (Redford), reduced to a stoned-out life selling breakfast cereal, impulsively rescues (steals) the once-

JOE JACKSON
I'm the Man (A&M)

With this, his second album, Joe Jackson consolidates his position as one of the major talents to emerge in the last couple of years. More by coincidence than by design, Jackson finds himself neatly sandwiched between the floss of Retro-Nouveau bands like the Knack and the more esoteric or adventurous New Wave artists, many of whom are still not considered safe enough for radio play. I'm the Man doesn't offer many obviously catchy cuts on a par with, say, "Sunday Papers" or "Is She Really Going out with Him?" but it delivers — in Jackson's disarmingly pleasant way — the angst and conviction that unite the work of today's best British artists, Graham Parker and Elvis Costello included.

One reason for Jackson's sudden popularity is that he comes off as a Real Person, with all the awkwardness and insecurity left in. Jackson also has a keen ear for musical coloration, such as the use of the Melodica, which echoes the work of reggae 'dub' masters like Augustus Pablo and King Tubby. This may be Jackson's greatest gift, to make reggae palatable to an audience reared almost solely on rock.

STEVE FORBERT
Jackrabbit Slim (Nemperor)

A young, charismatic singer-songwriter wearing an aluminum harmonica rack and strumming an acoustic guitar, Steve Forbert's late 1978 debut album, Alive on Arrival, triggered an outbreak of delusionary hysteria known as New Dylanitis. It's a disease similar to New Rolling Stonesitis, but somehow more cruel. Forbert's album abounded with charm, but Jackrabbit Slim is an inauspicious follow-up. The singer's voice, a broken, slightly sandpapered tenor, is about the only interesting element in an undistinguished package. The lyrics are sheer goo, the back-up is a muddle of styles ranging from Urban Folk Glossy to Pseudo-Jazz. John Simon's production credit comes as a shock; his solo albums and Music from Big Pink seem now like lucky shots in the dark. Jackrabbit Slim isn't bad enough to bury the hopes tagged to Steve Forbert, but it is an inconsistent and unfocused album.

STEVIE WONDER
Stevie Wonder's Journey Through the Secret Life of Plants (Tamla)

From the heavily embossed, Brailled and flower-scented fold-out cover to the twenty meandering selections stretching out over 84-minutes plus, Wonder elevates what is essentially mood music to a soft-focus epiphany of good vibes. Far from being a mix of strong material and filler, this album is almost entirely filler: electronic noodlings, avant-classic Japanese choral pieces, sound-effect strolls through rain forests, languid harmonica playing and a sort of terminal reflectiveness. Secret Life of Plants is the logical extension of crashing surf and singing whale albums, Alpha wave music to put us in touch with our vegetable pals. Wonder pulls it off with aplomb and a complete lack of self-consciousness. He's the kind of musician, and doubtlessly the kind of person, one wouldn't mind spending 84 minutes in a steaming jungle with. In fact, this set sounds as if it might have been written for plants: hothouse Muzak to help your garden grow.

TOM PETTY
Damn the Torpedoes (MCA)

They treat him like dirt. They drive him bankrupt and crazy, too. They probably tried to steal his flying V guitar. They ring his doorbell in the middle of the night and run behind the hedge. But Tom Petty survives.

Damn the Torpedoes is Tom Petty and the Hearbreakers' "Buckle Down Winsocki." Most of the songs are about alienation, rejection and mistreatment, tried and true rock themes. But the ring of twelve-string guitars and Petty's cocky tone announce that the problems won't crack him like an egg. Damn the Torpedoes is pure jumping up and down music, filled with precise guitar work and tight melodies, sung with rare passion. Ultimately it's an optimistic album as well. Petty and his band prove they're full of enough fire to overcome anything, even torpedoes.

Reggae is music made by Jamaicans with strange hairstyles who sit around & smoke giant spliffs of potent ganja

BOB MARLEY AND THE WAILERS Survival (Island)

Some people think reggae is just this oddly seductive, rhythmically compelling music made by Jamaicans with strange hairstyles who sit around and smoke giant spliffs of potent ganja all day in the warm tropical sun. These people are in for a surprise. Survival's cover is a montage-collage featuring flags of independent African nations interrupted by the stowage plan of a slave ship. Marley is talking directly about black survival, identity and unity, all intertwined with the African heritage of blacks.

Though the current Wailers are slick and deliberate compared to the fiery, rebellious earlier crew, they're every bit as effective in creating reggae's characteristic hypnotic sway. A horn section adds a welcome fulness and the Barrett Brothers re-assert their position as a premier rhythm section. Most important, Marley's singing is passionately committed and convincing.

Though "So Much Trouble in the World" and "One Drop" and the title track are stand-out songs, the album's most telling moment comes when Marley deals with the politically motivated attempt on his life in "Ambush in the Night." Over a chunky, clavinet-dominated chorus, he sings: "Ambush in the night/All guns aiming at me/Ambush in the night/They opened fire on me." I can't remember the last time I heard a lyric that makes its point with such chilling simplicity.

JEFFERSON STARSHIP
Freedom at Point Zero (Grunt)

If anything, the current Starship is more a new band than the Starship of 1974. Lead guitarist Craig Chaquico is more in control of his faculties than ever before, and his new-found writing talents are challenging Kantner as the band's dominant motifs. Bassist Pete Sears has also emerged to write and act an onstage presence. Aynsley Dunbar on drums is a magnificent improvement over the pissed-off pretensions of John Barbata. Mickey Thomas is in the strange position of replacing both Grace Slick (a victim of the bottle) and Marty Balin (a victim of the universe). On the surface he's a perfect choice, capable of imitating both Balin's high swirls and Slick's graceful arpeggios, but his voice soon sounds derivative, particularly of the vocals of that loathsome Melmac band, Toto. The best thing about the old Airplane was its blessedly anarchic sound. At moments they could be a real slob band. Thomas is too clean, too smooth. In a way, he takes a lot of fun out of the old Starship sound.

AEROSMITH
Night in the Ruts (Columbia)

The American "equivalent" of Zep, Aerosmith, has been showing signs of age lately, with an overbearing studio effort, Draw the Line, and a purposely trashy live set, Live Bootlets. Now comes Night in the Ruts wherein, except for a smattering of diversity, Aerosmith lives up to the dismal promise of the title.

To be sure, Ruts is a marked improvement over their two most recent efforts. Aerosmith sticks to their patented roar, crafted into neat four-minute slices. The guitars still punch out of the speakers, the beat is solid and Stephen Tyler's growling is as gritty as ever. But nothing sounds significantly different from past works. "No Surprise" (another perfect title) is lifted from the debut Aero LP, and Tyler's vocals on "Chiquita" echo "Sweet Inspiration." Horns are added for a Latino feel, but they're mere frills on a basic hard rock track.

Some Zeppelin licks are copped in "Three Mile Smile," there's a Yardbirds cover, "Reefer Headed Woman" is a lame essay at blues. (Sure they've paid dues... You know what the insurance premium is on their Lear jet?) Though Ruts isn't really a bad album, the creative stagnation it reveals may be why guitarist Joe Perry just exited from the group.

This trial symbolizes a clash between old and new values.

THE ODYSSEY THEATRE ENSEMBLE
The Chicago Conspiracy Trial (Capitol)

The Chicago Conspiracy Trial, "A theatrical arrangement of the original trial transcripts by Ron Sossi and Frank Condon," had been a runaway success at the Odyssey Theatre in Los Angeles for several months before record producer Nick Venet hit upon the idea of making a two-record set of the play.

The trial of the Chicago Eight (which began in September 1969) is still being studied and debated by historians, politicians and lawyers after a decade on the books. As effectively as the Sacco and Vanzetti or Rosenberg cases, the trial has come to symbolize the clash between old and new values, between revolution and repression. The defendants used the occasion of their trial to stage a kind of expanded public theatre, recognizing that their every speech and gesture was magnified and disseminated on the evening news, reaching more people than all their previous demonstrations combined. As defendant Jerry Rubin, about to be sentenced to five years' imprisonment, told Judge Julius Hoffman, "Julius, you radicalized more young people than we ever could. You are the country's top Yippie."

SHOES
Present Tense (Elektra)

Present Tense is Shoes' first full-fledged industry release, preceded by two home-made and thinly distributed albums, One in Versailles and Black Vinyl Shoes, the latter made from demo tapes at the insistence of early followers and strong enough to win the group a reported $330,000 label deal.

Though better engineered, Present tense is a continuation of Black Shoes' gentle sound, characterized by an unusual contrast between buzzing guitars and smooth, breathy voices. Love-torn heroes, the Shoes are constantly mistreated by heartless girls throughout Present Tense's delicate songs. These bittersweet songs, despite their brush with wimpy romantic vulnerability, present a superior strain of pop-rock.

All This Jazz

JOHNNY GRIFFIN
Bush Dance (Galaxy)

After successful tours of duty with Art Blakey's Jazz Messengers and Thelonious Monk's quartet in the late Fifties, Johnny Griffin, a fast and furious tenor saxist, split for the Continent in 1961. Only last year did he return stateside to tour and record. Bush, his second date for Galaxy, is another superlative demonstration of Griffin's amazingly charismatic saxophonics. He uses the basic vehicles — blues, jazz classics, salty ballads — and makes them bristle with life and feeling. Dizzy Gillespie's "A Night in Tunisia" is reworked, opening with an Afro-Cuban point of view that abruptly shifts to a blazing double time. Griffin's technique here is astoundingly precise, unequivocally swinging, while guitarist George Freeman adds twangy, loose lines and pianist Cedar Walton, an unsung jazz giant, executes spectacular, intricate ideas as if there were absolutely nothing to it. The title track has a quasi-rock beat, but all-acoustic instrumentation retains the jazz ambience. Two blues are explored, one of them Griffin's melodic "The Jamfs Are Coming" and the emotional "Since I Fell for You." Bush Dance is music to engage the imagination and get the body moving.

DON CHERRY, DEWEY REDMAN, CHARLIE HADEN, ED BLACKWELL
Old and New Dreams (ECM)

The "old dreams" here are formidable to contemplate. These four musicians have played in many contexts, each gaining well-deserved respect for mastery of his instrument (trumpet, tenor, bass and drums, respectively) and for importance to the avant-garde of the Sixties and Seventies. But it is their work, in various combinations, with one man — Ornette Coleman — that has most colored their own musical sensibilities.

Today, Coleman alternates between stripped-down modal R&B, personal seclusion and cosmic invisibility — one hesitates to imagine the nature of his dreams. But his spirit is very much in the foreground here. There are two of his songs, among them the famous "Lonely Woman," played brilliantly, softly, intensely, and with plenty of long, slow, incredibly rich bass lines. The rest of the tracks include a sprightly, remarkably consonant Cherry original called "Guinea," a Redman exotic called "Orbit of La-Ba" and Haden's "Song for the Whales," which is appropriately hard-blowing after the composer finishes his bowed whale-song imitations. (Haden has always been the John Lennon of the group.) The precision and oneness with which the group plays is admirable, if not surprising. What is surprising is how warm and well-rounded Cherry and Redman sound, and how gentle and dream-like much of the music feels.

AIR
Air Lore (Arista Novus)

In their sixth album, Air become folklorists for the black musical tradition while staying true to their instincts for improvising. Compositions by Scott Joplin and Jellyroll Morton are reconsidered, played not as museum relics, but in new ways that expand their melodic and rhythmic strengths.

Joplin's "The Ragtime Dance" glides from a reverent interpretation into a steeplechase tempo, then slows to a peristaltic strain. Henry Threadgill's alto sax tone is acerbic and Steve McCall's drum solo is a multi-leveled work of art. I suspect Joplin would have been awed.

Fred Hopkins' warm bass tones hold a blue, dirge-like tone throughout Morton's "Buddy Bolden Blues" (named for the early king of New Orleans trumpet players) while Threadgill's tenor sax takes some gnarly twists and turns as the group eases out of the theme and into the improv. A Threadgill original, "Paille Street," is the only non-repertory selection. It's a haunting, evocative flute melody that is neither in the ragtime nor New Orleans idiom, yet shows the continuity in the successive evolution of jazz movements.

CANNONBALL ADDERLY
What I Mean (Milestone)
WES MONTGOMERY
Groove Brothers (Milestone)
THELONIOUS MONK
The Riverside Trios (Milestone)

Bless Orrin Keepnews, head of A&R for Fantasy/Galaxy in Berkeley. A true jazz fan, he continually reissues gems from his Riverside (the great jazz label of the mid-Fifties to early Sixties) vaults on the Milestone Two-Fer series, and these value-priced sets are always good, often superb, generally the best music-per-dollar proposition on the market. Like Cannonball's What, a pair of 1961 dates. One half is in partnership with Bill Evans, and the pianist's light, gliding touch is an ideal foil for the robust, romantic altoist. Having worked together with Miles Davis in the late Fifties, the pair evoke a familiarity that constant musical companions achieve. Evans contributes some charming tunes, like the sailing "Waltz for Debby," and brings out a jaunty, pretty side that Cannon too rarely presented. The darker, more propulsive pianistics of Wynton Kelly turn the second set into a steamy, driving groove that is more typical of the late alto man. Here brother Nat Adderly on trumpet and vibist Victor Feldman add color to biting performances of Feldman's "New Delhi," a somber, misty piece; "Star Eyes," and Monk's two-chord opus, "Well, You Needn't."

Guitarist Wes Montgomery was, like Adderly, part of a musical family and Groove is Wes, brothers bassist Monk and pianist-vibist Buddy, plus drummers, joyfully at work. Here there is a happy, at-home presence, much like hearing a hot quartet at your local corner bar. The discs are a first-rate collection of tunes custom-made for blowing. Wes is in front where he belongs and we again delight in hearing his silky yet visceral sound, his calling-card parallel octaves (later copied by George Benson), his sublime melodic acuity. No slight to the brothers: Buddy is a very adept, moving pianist and Monk's bass is full and supportive. Among the selections are a finger-snapping reading of Duke Pearson's "Jeannine," a similarly spiffy take of Irving Berlin's "Remember" and Carl Perkins' "Groovyard," a title which is an apt description for this volume.

...we again delight in hearing his silky yet visceral sound...

The first major artist signed to Riverside in 1955 was Thelonious Monk, Keepnews having purchased his contract from Prestige for around $186; Trios, cut in 1955 and '56, are his first two dates for the label. Keepnews thought it best to have Monk playing other people's material rather than his own obtuse, angular tunes, so one disc is all-Ellington (the maestro's music a particular favorite of Monk's) and the other is a gathering of standards. Monk revels in it all, displaying his peek-a-boo left hand, wily right-hand phrasings, extended harmonies and ever-present sense of humor. As Charlie Parker once commented, "The Monk runs deep." Oscar Pettiford, after Jimmy Blanton the father of modern bass playing, and Kenny Clarke and Art Blakey, equally fundamental to jazz drumming, are the superb rhythm cohorts. In two words, classic recordings.

CHARLES MINGUS
Mingus at Antibes (Atlantic)

Mingus, in his playing and his compositions, was alternately exuberant, rascally, ironic, pungent, mellifluous, magisterial. He sought out musicians who more than just played: they had to be storytellers, instrumentalists who spoke to each other and the audience musically. This 1960 "live" date is superior. It is loaded with spontaneous one-on-one situations, packed with moments of bust-out swing, church-like shouting, quiet introspection. Eric Dolphy, on alto and bass clarinet, proves again that he was a bluesplayer at heart, wrenching out soulful, screaming solos on "Weds. Night Prayer Meeting" and "Better Get Hit in Yo' Soul." Texas tenorman Booker Ervin, with only handclaps to support him, out-sermonizes any oratory from the pulpit. Statements of depth are delivered by trumpeter Ted Curson, especially during his duet with Mingus on "What Love?" and Bud Powell scatters a few shooting stars on "I'll Remember April." Full-hearted music.

Heart Breaks

joined in the early Seventies. Ann first, then Nancy. They achieved a near-cult following in Seattle largely, according to Curtis, "by doing Led Zeppelin covers better than Led Zeppelin."

But Annie Wilson had more ambition than playing the female Robert Plant for the next forty years. She'd been writing original material for one thing. "We moved up to Vancouver where there was more of an open market," she says, cradling an untoilet-trained toy poodle on her lap. "There we were able to get a recording contract with Mushroom Records. Dreamboat Annie was first released only in Canada. And it really didn't begin to sell in the United States for quite awhile." Much of the year was spent exiled in interior Canada, packed in a van and driving 400 miles a day from, according to Ann, "one hockey game-concert to another." Once, just outside of Moose Jaw, Saskatchewan, they struck a moose. Near his jaw. "The van won that one," she recalls. "And the moose. Well, he had to walk off and die." But within a year, Dreamboat Annie really started to move. First in Canada, then in border towns and Detroit; finally it caught fire in Oregon and Washington. Within months its singles, "Magic Man" and "Crazy on You," had become as ubiquitous on USA radio as McDonald's jingles.

Next, however, was the much-ballyhooed falling out with Mushroom Records and the disastrous album Magazine, an abortive tossoff handed to Mushroom when the band determined to break their contract and seek other management. "It was a terrible album," Curtis remembers, "Mushroom didn't really have enough material to complete it, so they were hiring background singers right out of the local Aquarius Tavern or someplace."

But that's all water over the bridge.

"Oh, you know, it's just like they all say," the lovely and demure Nancy waves a hand in the air. "I'm just a shy little wispy person. Just a tiny slip of a creature. No thoughts of my own, nothing to say." A writer of short stories in the Donald Barthelme-meets-Dr. Seuss vein, Nancy is the less dramatic of the two Wilson sisters. She was a mildly introverted and retiring high school student at a time when Ann, clothed in costumes of red and black, would return to the family home zonked out of her gourd on acid and speed, barely able to fake enough straightness to avoid a one-way ticket to the booby hatch.

Nancy scoops the black poodle up with one slender hand. The dog has just peed on the newspapers like a good little puppy — instead of on Kaye Smith Recording Studio's expensive rug. On a television screen behind us, Iranian thugs, hoodlums and patriots curse infidel Jimmy Carter. Leese, Fossen and Derosier pore over a Nike running shoe poster/catalog they've spread out on the floor. "Those were the days," Ann remembers, referring to her acid queen phase. "But no more. Now I'm just a normal working stiff. No red-hot mama and no Helen Reddy." Down the hall, someone snaps on a tape from their album-to-be and I ask if she's worried about its being late.

"It's not late," Nancy says, "it's just... tardy."

"Yeah," Ann affirms, "we've got almost all the compositions complete and almost half the tracks down. I'm not too worried. We're disciplined. But," she makes a face, "if it's not out by Valentine's Day, we're late — for sure." What about the song "Break," is that a happy little message to Roger Fisher or what?

"No," Ann shakes her head. "I'm not that petty. It's more about a condition than it is about a single man. I went straight from my father's table to be with a man. I've always been with a man. And now it feels so good just to be by myself for awhile." The sound of this concept apparently delights her just to hear herself say it aloud, and she chats briefly about the future, cataloguing a veritable cornucopia of new boyfriend possibilities, hunks spied in grocery stores, banks, gas stations, crowds, department stores, passed on highways, you name it.

What about male groupies?

She laughs. "We've got good security, so it's no problem."

Heart is the first band from the Northwest United States to make it really big since the halcyon days of the Kingsmen, the Wailers, and Paul Revere and the Raiders, and the band has shown no interest in picking up stakes to move to L.A. or New York. "This is home," Ann says. "All our friends and family are here, and besides, it's a great place to live." Their recording facilities in Seattle are likewise excellent. Kaye Smith Studios has also handled the likes of Steve Miller, Elton John, and Johnny Mathis.

"What, pray tell," I ask, "lies in the future?"

"The new album will be a lot more rock and roll," Ann says. "I think we're going to steer away from the ballads for awhile. People want to start dancing to good old loud rock and roll again, I think."

What happens after the next album?

"Well," Ann sighs, "we'll all continue to work, putting out an album every nine months to a year. Nancy and I are very lucky. We've got a lot of support from our families — without any God-talk or anything — and are in pretty good control of our lives. Enough to care, enough not to care; I can get things out of my mind when I have to. We've also got a great organization around us. People we can trust." Kelly Curtis, for one, has been with the band since he was a kid. Literally. He was an original Heart roadie and is now an important officer, so to speak, in the Heart corporate structure. "A lot of groups can't handle both their art and their business. They think business is beneath them, that it should be some manager's worry." She looks out the window. "A lot of them end up out on the street. We're gonna survive and grow. Heart is nowhere near as good or as big as I think we can be. You watch."

ON TOUR

Madness
Whiskey A Go Go, Los Angeles

A heavy, heavy monster method
A fine Madness

There's a surprising musical revival going on in England: a group of interrelated, integrated bands — the Specials, Madness, the Selector, Dexy's Midnight Runners — are resuscitating the sounds of ska, Jamaica's frenzied up-tempo predecessor of reggae, a steamy Caribbean rereading of the classic New Orleans R&B of the Fifties.

America got its first look at the ska phenomenon with the arrival of Madness, whose quicky five-city American tour followed on the heels of their thirty-city adventure in England with the Specials and the Selector. From the first raucous exhortation of Madness' front man and master blaster Chas Smash — "HEY YOU! DON'T WATCH DOT! WATCH DIS!" — to the last churning chords of their instrumental "One Step Beyond," Madness conquered the ordinarily jaded Los Angeles audience with their refreshing, unrestrained sound.

Madness' material is admittedly slight, particularly compared to the sharp political commentary of the Specials. The songs cover such frivolous subject matter as underwear thievery, but, as rock 'n' roll keeps proving, it ain't necessarily what you say, but how you say. Madness plays with a crude ferocity that compulsively entertains. The pulsating blasts of keyboard player Mike Barson, guitarist Chris Foreman and honking sax man Lee "Kix" Thompson could bring the paralyzed to their feet.

Madness is also one of the most kinetic stage acts in recent memory. The band's "nutty sound" is meant for dancing, and, as if to provide a suitable example, the seven band members (and their peripatetic roadie Chalky) flip, flop and fly around the stage in a whirlwind of perpetual motion. The visual focus of the group is Chas Smash, a lean, beshaded, porkpie-hatted apparition who jerks and bops around the stage in a hipster's variation of the petit mal seizure. At one juncture, during the group's inspired instrumental take-off on "Swan Lake," Chas and Chalky engaged in a bizarre ska minuet and head-butting contest at center stage.

The February release by Sire of the band's Stiff album and a projected major U.S. tour in March should do much to spread the new gospel of ska on these shores.

Tom Petty and the Heartbreakers
Masonic Temple, Detroit

Rock concert antics often seem to work in the live situation but seem hackneyed afterwards. Tom Petty's jivey Detroit appearance proved no exception. Nevertheless, the new-found maturity in his Damn the Torpedoes LP is also becoming apparent in Petty's live shows.

Despite the obvious Bruce Springsteen and former Byrd Roger McGuinn influences — over which too much ink has already been shed — Petty manages to be a fresh, if not exactly original, voice in rock. Although he is emphatically not a part of the new wave, Petty brings rock toward its basics, musically; lyrically, the Petty of Damn the Torpedoes is striking out into new areas. This is due no doubt to his recent legal hassles (again, a Springsteen parallel).

It is hard to believe that the Petty of old could write songs like "Even the Losers" and "Refugee" and sing them with such conviction. On these songs, clearly the high points, Petty managed to transcend the limitations of his voice to deliver a stronger statement than just the pain of adolescent love. His new songs strike a responsive chord with all those who feel embattled by fate.

Though marred by grandstanding, the live performance was a showcase for Tom Petty the singing songwriter. One concertgoer not terribly familiar with Petty remarked "I didn't know he had so many good songs."

Oddly enough, his older material also seemed to improve in the live setting. Perhaps Petty's voice can finally convey the emotions that were always within him.

Martin Mull/The Rick and Ruby Show
Santa Barbara

Martin Mull is a very funny man. Few, if any, performers will ask an audience if they like country music, and then respond to the scattered applause with, "You'll get over it." Mull not only gets away with snotty, withering condescension; it is expected of him.

In fact, there was a point in the show where Mull simply discarded whatever structure he may have had and invited the crowd to shout at will. And shout the would-be comedians did — only to be summarily and sarcastically disposed of by the man in the easy chair. It was a very funny few minutes, demonstrating what a truly graceful creature a professional comedian can be.

But it also left a nagging doubt about Mull's humanity quotient. Isn't he having any fun at all behind that sardonic sneer? Why does he project the feeling that this is just another crowd, just another night? There was just this feeling — nothing more — that he couldn't wait to get back to Malibu and balance his checkbook.

Mull's show was preceded by a trio known as the Rick and Ruby Show; they concentrated on musical parodies of everyone from Johnny Cash to the Ohio Players and KC and the Sunshine Band. The accuracy of their sarcasm was awesome.

Vladimir Horowitz
Academy of Music, Philadelphia

A circus atmosphere precedes any concert appearance by Vladimir Horowitz. The legend, the tales of his eccentricities, the long waiting lines for tickets (to say nothing about the fears of ticket-holders that the concert may be called off at the last moment, which happened here three times in two years), all threaten to overwhelm the very reason all that fuss is made over him in the first place: Vladimir Horowitz gets sounds out of his wonderful, meticulously tuned Steinway that mere mortals can barely imagine.

His academy program was carefully chosen to show off the best aspects of his pianistic ability. The opening Clementi sonata, for example, was a slight piece of music made interesting by Horowitz' use of elegant coloristic effects and delicate fingerwork. That was followed by a Schumann group — the rare Opus 111 Fantasiestucke and a pair of Nachtstucke. Schumann was one of the most romantic of composers, and Horowitz has always identified closely with this passionate music with its many shifts of mood.

Chopin straddled the intermission. Before intermission came the only "basic repertory" piece on the program, the G Minor Ballade. I think even Horowitz fans must be getting tired of it by now, but not in this unusually expressive rendition. After intermission came a Nocturne and a Mazurka, in which Horowitz made the piano sing as if he were a vocal master instead of a keyboard wizard.

Then, with barely a pause for breath, he launched into Rachmaninoff's Second Sonata. Hardly anyone plays this sonata, for a good, sound logical reason: hardly anyone can. Rachmaninoff wrote it for a pianist (namely himself) to whom technical difficulties were simply irrelevant, and it also helps if the performer has an understanding of Rachmaninoff's peculiar brand of Russian melancholy. Since Rachmaninoff's death, Horowitz has come closest; here he strained the Steinway to its limits in producing orchestral sonorities and thunderous climaxes, contrasted with lyrical passages of sad and majestic beauty. This was transcendental pianism and ecstatic music-making.

Robert Bly
Ballantine Hall, Indiana University, Bloomington, Indiana

During the late Sixties Robert Bly acquired a type of notoriety unlike that of most contemporary poets when he organized a series of readings against the Vietnam War and published a lot of angry poetry ("The Teeth Mother Naked at Last" being the most famous). I was curious; how would Bly sound as the Seventies come to a close — a poetic William Sloane Coffin, still? Would he debut a new poem, "The Nuclear Industry Naked at Last"? In fact, Bly is simply a better poet now than he was ten years ago. Heavily influenced by Oriental poetry, by his many translations of Asian poets, from which he read also, Bly speaks now of creating moments in his poetry when his inner, human consciousness merges with some other, outer consciousness. Confusing? Not after you've heard him read.

A friend who had seen Bly in Chicago told me he might do things like read each poem two or three times, or take his shoes off in the middle of the reading. Sure enough, Bly began by saying, "You really have to hear a poem twice to get all of it. The first time's like flying over in an airplane." Then he glanced around and had someone dim most of the lighting: "You can't read poetry with all the lights on." Five minutes later, off came the shoes: "You can't read poetry with your shoes on."

Accompanying himself at times on a dulcimer, one time donning a mask and reciting in the voice of an old hag, Bly varied the mood and tempo of the performance with such dexterity that he held his audience captive for over two hours. Still an outspoken social critic, Bly spoke between poems of various dangers to society ranging from war to television. Only once, though, did his anger surface, when he denounced President Carter's action freezing Iranian assets.

We didn't want to hear about Iran. We were seeking, and had for a time found, refuge from a frustrating world in the cadences of Bly's artistry.

Shostakovich: Surviving Stalin

Dmitri Shostakovich was and remains the most important figure in the history of Soviet music. The last great composer in the traditional symphonic form, he compiled one of the major bodies of work in this century, including fifteen symphonies, an equal number of string quartets, a number of concertos, chamber works, vocal and choral pieces, operas and other compositions, many of which remain in the active performing repertory. A child of the revolution, educated under Bolshevik rule, Shostakovich became a world-famous composer while still in his early twenties, suffered through and survived the purges of the Stalin era, and continued to produce major works until his death in 1975.

Now we have a different, darker side to Shostakovich's story, from Shostakovich himself. In his last years he dictated his memories to the young musicologist Solomon Volkov, who arranged them into coherent chapters to which Shostakovich affixed his signature. These have been published as Testimony: The Memoirs of Dmitri Shostakovich (Harper & Row, $15.00), a unique oral history of an era of which we still know too little.

Shostakovich gives us a picture of creative life in the Soviet Union that is truly frightening. He rose to prominence at the very time that Stalin ascended to supreme political power; Stalin knew little about music, or any other art form, but he did know that it could be a powerful tool in the control of popular feeling, and he did his best to keep it under his thumb. In the "Great Terror" of the Thirties, musicians, poets, painters, and artists of the stage and the cinema were among the many who simply disappeared into the Gulag. They were quickly supplanted by talentless hacks who were all too willing to hew to the party line and write simple, boring paeans to the glory of Lenin and Stalin. Shostakovich himself came under personal attack twice, in 1936 and 1948; these attacks did not come despite his world fame, as has been popularly thought, but because of it. Stalin was insanely jealous of any Soviet who gained prominence comparable to his own, and the hacks jumped at the opportunity to raise their own stock by bringing down someone who made them look bad. During the worst years, Shostakovich was able to live only because Stalin paradoxically decided that only Shostakovich was qualified to score the Stalin-glorifying film epics commissioned from the Soviet film industry.

But Shostakovich has more to tell us, much more. From him we learn of the terror of living in a nation in which one could disappear forever at any time. We learn of the folk cultures that Stalin destroyed and replaced with frauds that glorified the Revolution. We learn of the plagiarism that is a way of life in Soviet music. More important, we learn about the people Shostakovich knew — Meyerhold, Tukhachevsky, Glazunov, Khachaturian, Akhmatova and many others, many of them forgotten because they were destroyed by Stalin. It is here, in giving names and faces to some of these victims, that Shostakovich does perhaps his greatest service, for he helps to document an age when the keeping of books, diaries and photographs could be fatal, an age for which the only written history was that approved by the State.

The Soviet copyright agency, understandably enough, has condemned the publication of Testimony, claiming it to be a fraud, but there are too many good lines and anecdotes for that. More important, the voice of the narrator is too close to the musical voice of the composer of some of the greatest works of this century — works now revealed to be "tombstones" for the "mountains of corpses," the victims with no known burial place.

Working Class Hero

Gunter Wallraff, author of The Undesirable Journalist (The Overlook Press, $10.00), is a West German investigative journalist whose proddings of corporate and state fascism have made him a hero of that country's working class. While most of us see the violence done humans by military, economic and corporate systems and then do our personal best to get out of the bad weather, Wallraff infiltrates the systems — which are always hungry for more toadies and stoolies — then spies and lies his way through until he can record damning evidence. Abbie Hoffman, writing in Mother Jones, linked Wallraff to Hunter Thompson, but Thompson is a whack-off by comparison.

Chapter One, "The Coup Merchants," finds him posing as the rep of a powerful German who wishes to give arms and aid to right-wing terrorists in Portugal. After brassing his way through contacts with local-level organizers and functionaries, Wallraff lures General Antonio Ribeiro de Spinola, former Portugese President and current head of an armed and dangerous right wing organization, into a bogus meeting. In minutes, Spinola is telling the journalist, and a man posing as President of a secret German political faction, how they should smuggle in arms ("We are mainly interested in highly sophisticated automatic weapons") to help him "annihilate" members of the rival Communist Party. Everyone knows Fascists play rough; Wallraff breaks into their games nonetheless, taunts them into revelations and then sneaks out with a report. In Chapter Two he successfully applies for work with the German government as a paid informer on left-wing students. How does he find the Political Commissariat and begin the game? It's simple. Theirs is the only office door in the Police Headquarters building with its nameplate removed.

Through ten chapters, The Undesirable Journalist mixes the grim with the ludicrous. Posing as a senior official in a totally fictitious government bureau ("Civil Defence Board of the Federal Ministry of the Interior"), he tricks industrial managers into spelling out their in-progress plans to drill illegally-armed troops for use against strikers. After that story broke, Wallraff was unsuccessfully brought to trial for "false impersonation and unauthorized use of title."

Wallraff's book, which no journalist, journalism student or student of social dynamics should miss, shows that the systems have structural cracks, and that controlled, methodical rage can drive wedges into them. Wallraff didn't stumble across these fascinating, angry stories. He made them happen.

Laughter Cures

For those with the remotest intention to read a book on holistic medicine, Norman Cousins' Anatomy of an Illness (Norton, $9.95) is an odds-on bet. Former Saturday Review editor and presently senior lecturer in humanities at UCLA Medical School, Cousins is here concerned with demonstrating the truth of some vintage Milton: "The mind...in itself can make a heaven of hell, and a hell of heaven."

The book centers on Cousins' account of his recovery from ankylosis spondylitis, a rheumatic disease with no known cure resulting in characteristic immobility of the spinal column. If we are to believe Cousins (oh, let's), his recovery hinged on guffawing at old Candid Camera films, massive intravenous doses of Vitamin C, and a move to a hotel ("A hospital is no place for a person who is seriously ill"). The account overcomes a vaguely embarrassing testimonial tone to divulge the fascinating reasoning behind such self-prescription.

Cousins explores the placebo response, the doctor as placebo, and the ethical catch-22 involved in placebo testing: the doctor can tell the truth and ruin the placebo's effectiveness or lie and put a doctor-patient relationship based on trust in jeopardy. Along the way there are documented cases of placebo success so...bizarre that Ripley might have goggled in disbelief. Cousins' point is that psychogenic medicine has come of age — "miracle cures" as legitimate subjects.

Granted that Cousins' illness lies in that ephemeral area where treatment is still more art than science, it might seem surprising to read him in defense of the scientific method. Squarely in Lewis (Lives of a Cell) Thomas' territory, Cousins maintains that the problem with medical "science" is that it isn't scientific enough. Still, he bemoans the traditional lack of comprehensive nutrition courses in medical schools and complains that today's M.D.s are "beautifully trained but poorly educated."

If all this sounds like something to be discussed at a low-proof cocktail party, it's not. It's an eloquent plea for holistic medicine (which treats the mind and body as a single entity) and medical science to get together, for a little compassion and warmth on the part of the M.D., for a little participation, laughter, and will on the part of the patient. Fair enough?

Hemingway, Ashberry & Lux

"All poetry is difficult to read," Robert Browning once said.

Indeed it is. But some for different reasons than others.

Three new volumes of verse — which have nothing else in common except that each was written by a 20th-century American male — are, each in its own way, pretty rough going.

Sunday by Thomas Lux (Houghton Mifflin, $4.95) is a tough one simply because it doesn't give us very much to hold onto — no dissonant insights; none of the poet's thick, twisted thinking; not even much rich language. It's just too plain — and it is not the deviously plain language of, say, Mark Strand (the kind that turns the commonplace in upon itself), it is the plain language of a young man's ingenuousness — language like "When I was barely human nobody loved me./Ditto the other way around."

There are nice moments, such as the elegy for a dead friend which begins "A message from a secretary tells me first/the heavy clock you were/in your mother's lap/has stopped. Later I learn who/stopped it: you,..." But most of Lux's aperçues and thin musings offer little to slow us down as we walk through them, much less anything for us to dig for. All the secrets are too near the surface.

That could never be said of John Ashberry, whose volume As We Know (Penguin, $7.95) consists largely of a complex, maddening, arcane work called "Litanies." It is difficult to read not only because of Ashberry's dense language and mysterious, tight-fisted transitions of mood and subject, but also — most of all — because it is written in two parallel columns and is, the poet tells us, "meant to be read as simultaneous but independent monologues." That's not easy for the lone reader to do.

InPrint

The monologues might be independent, but the voices speaking them are not ("You have/no right to take something out of life," the right-hand column says at one point, "And then put it back, knowingly, beside/Its double, from whom/The original tensions unwittingly came"). "Litanies" is certainly, at the least, about considering life through its smaller manifestations, and seems to be about moving through them toward some sense of (dare one say it?) purpose or broader meaning. It is a kind of verbal working out of big issues through a skein of smaller ones.

The hard thing about reading 88 Poems by Ernest Hemingway, edited by Nicholas Gerogiannis (Harcourt Brace Jovanovich/Bruccoli Clark, $8.95), which is the first authorized edition of that great, hard-bitten author's collected poems, is that almost all of what he has penned as poetry is so damned unpleasant.

Hemingway was basically an asshole — selfish, brutal, disloyal, and sanctimoniously masculine — and he wrote a master's prose because of it. Vices of personality became great virtues of art: his selfishness and disloyalty made him write what he wanted to write, no matter whom it hurt; his brutality gave his prose a furious density, an almost unimaginable power (it is no accident that, in one of his poems, he calls his typewriter a mitrailleuse — a machine-gun); his sanctimonious masculinity gave his works a strange tenderness and a worldly sentimentality that more "sensitive" writers would never have dared.

Above all, his prose was strong enough, rich enough, right enough to accommodate almost anything he might apply to it. Verse is an incomparably more fragile form. There's no "story" as foundation, no room for people in the fictional sense. What we see in 88 Poems is simply Hemingway the wise guy; Hemingway the snide, superior young literateur; Hemingway the gruff, death-obsessed tough guy. And we see him plain. There are no great, noble plays being acted in the foreground; there is no larger canvas of tragedy or cosmic comedy. It's just bitch, bitch, bitch — at English teachers, "lady poets," Edmond Wilson, the war, and death, death, death, death, death.

Two Thrillers

The mystery-thriller is a genre for which Americans have an apparently insatiable appetite, as a perusal of drug store book racks makes eminently clear. The quality of these books ranges wildly rom the exquisite artistry of Le Carré through the reliably interesting stories of John D. MacDonald, to the violence-laden hack work of the pulpers. Two examples falling somewhere in the middle were recently published by the Delacorte Press, The CUPPI, by Sandy Johnson ($8.95) and American Surrender, by Michael Brady ($9.95). The dollar difference is deceptive, as Ms. Johnson's novel is by far the better.

American Surrender is a highly improbable and jingoistically motivated spy thriller something like The Manchurian Candidate in which those astonishingly clever Russians dupe those equally astonishingly dim Americans into handing over the keys to the country. This is effected by introducing a temptress into the counsels of the President whose election was engineered in Moscow. The First Lady, incidentally, had been brainwashed during her formative years while attending a Russian-run finishing school. And so it goes. Forget it.

The CUPPI is a rather more satisfying product. The title is an acronym for "circumstances undetermined pending police investigation," and refers to the death of an adolescent girl who either fell, jumped or was pushed out of a sleazy New York hotel window. A photographer named Homer Wood gets involved in the investigation partly because he knows a lot of cops and partly because the dead girl resembles his own daughter. The reader travels with him through some of the seamier sides of American life — adolescent prostitution, rape, drug addiction, and thereby gets a feeling for what big city police face. In her acknowledgments, Ms. Johnson, an actress whose face on the dust jacket is unplaceably familiar, mentions a number of detectives and patrolmen, NYPD officials and members of the medical examiners staff. She appears to have done her homework and we profit from it in this well paced and sometimes moving first novel. Remember it.

Falling into the Hole

The answer to the question of the existence of black holes will be as profound as Darwin's discovery of the theory of evolution. Walter Sullivan, America's best-known science writer, explores the possibilities in Black Holes: The Edge of Space, The End of Time (Anchor, $17.95), his astronomical follow-up to We Are Not Alone.

Simply, black holes are celestial masses of incredible density (imagine the earth compressed to the size of a ping-pong ball) and so possessing tremendous gravitational forces. The pull of a black hole's gravity is so strong that even light cannot escape it, time is stopped and space does not exist. It is not, however, as clear-cut as that, because there is no certainty that black holes are a reality. Conjecture, theory and circumstantial evidence are what the scientists are working with.

Yet the implications of a confirmed black hole can be staggering. It would unravel the mystery both of the universe's creation and its eventual destruction. The philosophical implications would make Inherit the Wind look like Mary Poppins.

While Sullivan's book does enter technical areas and tends to be a tad dry in places, it should be required reading for anyone interested in the grand concepts of space and time. As Einstein's Relativity should be understood by any student of the twentieth century, the idea of black holes is crucial to students of the future. Black Holes gives a nice introduction to and summary of this fascinating subject.

On Screen

champion doped-up steroided racehorse owned and exploited by the same evil cereal conglomerate (embodied in soulless John Saxon, so villainous it's surprising he doesn't sport a handlebar mustache and stovepipe hat). In the bargain, the cowboy also rescues his self-esteem; joined by clever TV newswoman Fonda (in pursuit of a hot story), the four of them — two people, one horse, and all that self-esteem — trek through beautiful country and find the True Meaning of Life and Freedom, or something. Along the way we're treated to a dazzling chase sequence, with Redford and the horse outrunning three police cars and two motorcycle cops. It should be noted that, just like plucky dames in those Forties flicks, Fonda traipses across Utah in high-heeled boots carrying a large metal case of TV camera equipment.

The pacing is so slow, so choppy, that Fonda and Redford don't make sparks until the movie is almost over...but when they finally look into each other's eyes, out there in the mountain moonlight, with the horse looking beautiful in the background, the corniness of this classy trash fades away, leaving just images of perfection. Oh, if we were all so handsome, we wouldn't need dumb movies like this.

SCAVENGER HUNT, starring Richard Benjamin, Cloris Leachman, Ruth Gordon, and Tony Randall; written by Steven A. Vail and Henry Harper; directed by Michael Shultz.

Scavenger Hunt, in which teams of characters played mostly by TV situation comedy and game-show regulars try to win a perverse board-game inventor's estate by collecting the likes of a toilet, an ostrich, and a fat person, is fun for the entire family, especially if cretinism runs therein. Thunderously childish — indeed, geared to the mentality of someone who's recently been lobotimized — it's a truly horrific piece of filmmaking in every way.

The script is such that those who appear most briefly come off best, as in, "First prize: a role in Scavenger Hunt; second prize: a larger role..." Meat Loaf, as the casually ruthless leader of a bikers' gang, and Ruth Gordon, as a sweet old woman with a houseful of munitions, have the film's best moments.

The bad guys' team comprises Richard Benjamin, Cloris Leachman and Richard Mazur, the scourge of many Norman Lear sit-coms, as Leachman's insufferably bratty and apparently retarded son. Benjamin here tightens his grip on the title of the most egregious screen personality of his generation, and Leachman plays her bitchy and avaricious character in such a way as to suggest that she has neither shame nor respect for the memory of her generally superb television work.

Michael Schultz's direction is largely inept — never more glaringly than when everyone sort of mills around and blows raspberries at one another for ten minutes before the inevitable happy ending finally shows up.

If you think Mel Brooks might be hilarious, except that most of his stuff goes over your head, this may be just the zany madcap laff-riot for you.

tech talk:

Phase linearity.

To understand what an MCS Series® Linear Phase speaker can do, you have to understand what a conventional speaker can't do. A conventional speaker can't deliver all the sound it produces to your ear at exactly the same instant. The major cause of this lies in the way a conventional speaker is constructed. As you can see by the diagram, a conventional speaker is arranged with the woofer (bass), mid-range and tweeter (small high-range speaker) mounted so that their outer edges are on the front surface. As you can also see, these speaker elements differ in depth. That means the acoustical centers in the middle of each speaker which actually produce sound are also staggered. And so is the sound reaching your ear. MCS Linear Phase speakers start out with specially designed speaker elements and crossover networks. Then the elements themselves are staggered (see diagram again) in such a way that their acoustical centers are precisely aligned. The result is sound to make you think you've never heard stereo before. But don't take our word for it, listen to your ears. After all, where MCS Series Linear Phase speakers are concerned, one sound is worth a thousand words. MCS Series Linear Phase speakers. Only at JCPenney.

Town spending cap ignores state figures

By STEVEN A. COHEN
Associated Press Writer

BOSTON — The stateimposed cap limiting spending growth in the cities and towns to 4 percent annually can't be applied to the state, says one of the King administration's top fiscal experts.

Even though the administration figures Gov. Edward J. King's budget recommendations for the next fiscal year represent a growth rate of only 4 percent, Undersecretary of Administration Robert H. McClain says that has nothing to do with the tax cap.

"The concept can't apply to the state," McClain said in a recent interview.

"We have colleges and over $1.6 billion in welfare payments. There's $976 million for Medicaid. We pay whatever the hospitals charge, according to the rates, which are determined by inflation.

"The point is, these costs were once borne by the cities and towns, but we now bear them. They have nothing comparable."

Gov. King

After all the controversy over the spending cap, it appears Gov. King will not be able to meet the limit himself.

McClain also said the twoyear tax cap law includes exceptions for the few cities which still operate public hospitals.

King's $5.9 billion budget for the fiscal year beginning July 1 is 5.4 percent higher than the total appropriated so far this year, but it is only 4 percent higher than total appropriations anticipated by the year's end, according to administration figures.

McClain explained that a deficiency budget of some $72 million will be forthcoming to get the state through the rest of the year.

Not included in next year's total is some $97 million in special recommendations for expansion of human services programs. King made them contingent on special initiatives outside normal revenue channels, such as the sale of surplus state land.

"The special section depends on those revenues," McClain said. "There is no money available for those programs unless they (the Legislature) come up with new revenue sources," and new taxes are out of the question, he said.

Among the items tied to the cost-offsetting programs are pay hikes for welfare recipients and increased funding for children's programs.

McClain said there have been other governors in Massachusetts' history who have submitted budgets with similar options, proposing various possible levels of growth.

"People (seeking expansion) are missing the point in these times," McClain said.

Field and the SGA

Dean delivers memo charging misconduct in student government

By ED LEVINE
Collegian Staff

Dean of Students William F. Field paid a visit to the Undergraduate Student Senate last night.

Field's appearance at the semester's first senate meeting was not a social call, however. Field came to the meeting to deliver a memorandum addressing the issue of a document recently issued by the administration alleging financial, personal and political misconduct by the Student Government Association.

In his memorandum Field explained to the senators why the document was prepared.

"Some of us who were familiar with the SGA's recent history realized that a new Chancellor and a relatively new Vice Chancellor did not share that familiarity, and an historical document was prepared describing some of the recurring problems some of these individuals were likely to be called upon to address," Field's memo said.

Dean Field

Field was referring to Chancellor Henry Koffler, who came to UMass last fall and Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs Dennis L. Madson, who assumed the position in the fall of 1978.

Field's memorandum further explained the rationale behind the document.

"The compilation of the document was nothing more or less than an effort to sift the kernels of truth from the chaff of rumor and innuendo. The issues were carefully researched and fully documented..."

Field's memo was issued in response to a letter sent to senators by senate speaker David Routhier last week which attacked Field and the administration for attempting to use the document as a "weapon" against the SGA, the memo stated.

'I don't want anyone to go off half cocked. I will come back when everyone's read it and is ready to discuss it. I'll stake my life on everything in it—it's true.'

"The campus administration was aware of the problems described in the document at the times at which they occurred: Their value as "weapons" was greatest when the abuses were fresh and the simcreants still wielding power, while now time has blunted whatever edge existed. It should be remembered that the document was completed last October. Were its purpose sinister, one might have expected some action along those lines by now," Field's memo stated.

Field said he would address the senate on the issue when more senators have had time to read the document.

"I don't want anyone to go off half cocked," he said. "I will come back when everyone's read it and is ready to discuss it. I'll stake my life on everything in it—it's true."

Planners oppose Southwest fences

By STEVE SEMPLE
Collegian Staff

A Umass Planning Committee Monday opposed construction of a six—foot, wrought iron fence — which would cost approximately $20,000 — along a section of median strip on Massachusetts Avenue.

The committee did, however, vote to recommend other safety features on campus including:

a five—foot high fence which would separate Commonwealth Avenue from the athletic fields.

traffic lights at the intersection of Massachusetts Avenue and Commonwealth Avenue and at the intersection of Massachusetts Avenue and University Boulevard.

extending the median along Massachusetts Avenue to close off west—bound access to Sunset Avenue.

These recommendations, along with those of the University Health Council's Safety Committee, will be considered at the February 14 meeting of the Faculty Senate. The Health Council's recommendation differs from the planning committee's in that the council endorses construction of the Massachusetts Avenue fence.

Executive Director of Health Services, Barry Averill, said yesterday that the Massachusetts Avenue fence was necessary because of the "potential for serious accidents."

According to figures provided by the Safety Committee, there have been 236 automobile accidents on the street since January 1974: 33 involving pedestrians. That equals 5.5 pedestrian—related accidents a year. A study performed in 1977 indicated that there are about 760 pedestrian crossings on Massachusetts Avenue per hour.

One concern of opponents of the fence is that the Southwest Residential Area will be isolated from the rest of the campus. Opponents also said drivers might become less cautious if a fence is built, no longer expecting any pedestrian traffic.

Harvey Kline, Faculty Senate secretary, said that although "nobody wants a student to be hit by a car," with the implementation of other safety measures, the "potential for injury could be cut to a minimum."

Escape stirs Iranian ire

The Associated Press

Iran's foreign minister, angered by the Canadian rescue of six Americans trapped in Tehran, declared yesterday he expects the U.S. Embassy hostages to suffer for Canada's "duplicity."

The estimated 50 hostages "most probably" will now be treated more harshly, Foreign Minister Sadegh Ghotbzadeh said, and the responsibility will be Canada's.

Ghotbzadeh, at a Tehran news conference, denounced the secret Canadian operation as a "flagrant violation" of international law and warned that retribution would be exacted from the Canadians sooner or later.

But the Moslem militants who have held the embassy and hostages for 88 days refrained from immediately endorsing Ghotbzadeh's threat of tougher conditions for their captives. Spokesmen said a formal statement might be issued later, but some reports quoted militants as saying they would not treat the hostages any differently. A State Department spokesman said Tuesday such a reprisal would be "irrational."

Iran's domestic political troubles flared into new fighting, meanwhile.

Reports reaching Tehran said at least 10 persons were killed and 20 others injured yesterday in clashes between the central regime's revolutionary guards and Kurdish militants in western Iran.

The official Iranian news agency said two army officers held hostage since Monday by unidentified insurgents in the Kurdish town of Salmas were killed.

U.S. ruled out for Olympics

Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Carter administration wants to make sure American athletes can show their skills but does not want the United States to be the site of an alternative to the Moscow Olympic Games, a congressional panel was told yesterday.

Nelson Ledsky, deputy assistant secretary of state for congressional relations, said, "We want our athletes to be able to compete. They have worked very hard, often for years, to perfect their skills."

But he also said the administration is determined that the Soviet Union must withdraw its military forces from Afghanistan or face a refusal by the United States to take part in the competition.

"We must convince the Soviets that they will pay a price for their aggression, whether in Afghanistan or elsewhere," said Ledsky, a member of the administration's ad hoc force on the Olympics.

"The United States would favor organizing some form of alternate games in the fall or summer of 1980," he said.

"We will join as appropriate in working with other governments to organize such alternative games," Ledsky said, adding:

"Our preference is that such games not be held in the United States ... At the same time, the United States would be ready if necessary to host such games."

Ledsky told the House transportation and com-

Escaped diplomats return to America

(AP) — The six Americans who escaped Iran with the help of the Canadian embassy returned to the United States yesterday, Air Force officials said.

"They will be spending the night and will meet with their families at the air base tomorrow," said Major Robert Groom, press information officer at Dover Air Force Base.

Groom said the diplomats would not be permitted to meet with reporters here, but would go to Washington today and appear Friday at a news conference at the State Department.

Carter says Caribbean 'not of vital interest'

WASHINGTON (AP) — President Carter says he sees no outside threat to the Caribbean area and therefore will not promise to use military force to defend it.

Carter thus declined to place the neighboring Caribbean in the same "vital interest" category as the Persian Gulf. He also asserted the United States would not be able, now or in the future, to defend the Persian Gulf area by itself.

The president made the statements Tuesday in a question and answer session with visiting editors and broadcasters. The White House released a transcript of the session yesterday.

Ice storm sweeps Midwest — 13 dead

(AP) — A winter storm that left Southern California mired in mud and some Western states buried under knee-deep snow pushed into the nation's mid-section yesterday spreading treacherous ice into Dixie.

Hundreds of schools closed, lights went out and cars slammed together as the storm that produced Utah's heaviest snowfall in six years pushed into Kansas, Nebraska, Oklahoma, Arkansas, Missoure, Illinois, Tennessee and northern Alabama.

Gold price leaves Statehouse dome dull

BOSTON (AP) — The state superintendent of buildings says Massachusetts can't afford to regild the Statehouse dome now that gold is more than $700 an ounce.

Superintendent Charles J. Buffone figures the 5,000 square feet of almost pure gold leaf on the dome is worth "about !1 million."

Parts of the dome were regilded in 1969, when gold went for $40 an ounce. That job cost the state $8,000. The same job today would cost $120,000 for the gold leaf alone, not including labor.

An anti-draft demonstration at New York City's Columbia University breaks into a free-for-all, yesterday, as students of different factions tussle over the American flag.

Engineering Dean dismisses 'trade school' fears

By MICHAEL SILVA
Special to the Collegian

A drive by the school of engineering to collect $5.5 million from private industries "will work to be[illegible] t the University image" rather than creat[illegible] "trade—school image," said Dean of Civil [illegible]ineering Clive Dym.

The capital fund drive, initiated last December as a pilot project designed to determine future UMass—state industry relationships, is being supported by Gov. Edward J. King. King said he would donate $250 of "unused campaign money" to the engineering school.

Concerned about opinions that the school of engineering, sole beneficiary of the proposed drive, will acquire a trade—school image, Dym said yesterday that "this University will never become a trade—school" and it would be an "unfortunate image" for the University.

Dym said the money, equivalent to the total amount of state and private funds budgeted for the school of engineering, is being used to replace outdated equipment.

Dym also said "parallel efforts are being made in conjuncture with other departments" to raise money from private sources to supplement state funds.

However, though Robert Sleigh Jr., Acting Associate Provost, agreed it is "very unlikely this will become a trade school," he emphasized that all departments have cut expenses and are in need of additional funding. Sleigh, former Philosophy Department dean, said yesterday that continuing the present level of educational services at the University is dependent on whether the state will allocate additional funds for the expected salary increases when the faculty contract expires June 30.

Sleigh said the school of engineering has a "very practical chance of making money" which they should pursue. He added the money will hopefully be used to supplement the engineering budget and would spill over to aid other departments.

Speaking about the future of liberal arts at the University, Paul S. Boyer, History Deparment Chairman, said yesterday that its future "is still up in the air" concerning future budget needs. Boyer said physical sciences can raise money from industries because they have "very direct ways to show monetary gains" but liberal arts are "certainly discussing" ways to develope alternate sources of funding.

Anti-nuke group begins campaign

By JON KLEIN
Collegian Staff

Traditionally, the New Hampshire presidential primary has been the catalyst or death of many Presidential campaigns. While the Iowa caucuses may have eclipsed New Hampshire for some, at least one organization is hoping to ignite a nationwide campaign beginning in New England.

The Campaign for Safe Energy met here last night to recruit and organize volunteers to travel into New Hampshire. The group's goal is to "mobilize citizens to come out and confront candidates" on the issue of nuclear power, said Susan Birmingham, a member of the organization.

The group is overseen by MassPIRG, a public interest research group, and includes several anti-nuclear groups across the country.

Members say the group is non—partisan and is trying to influence the two major parties, not only individual candidates. They do not plan to endorse any candidate, but hope to force an anti—nuclear plank into party platforms. By canvassing voters, confronting candidates and lobbying delegates the group hopes to "elect safe energy" in November, said media coordinator Larry Magid.

Birmingham said the group started to coalesce after the anti-nuclear rally in Washington D.C. last May. Late last December they began seeking support on college campuses and sending the first groups of workers to New Hampshire for its Feb 26 primary.

At their meeting last night the organizers stressed the goal of educating the voters. "Candidates offer glib, spoon—fed responses that sound intelligent," said Birmingham.

"You can address Reagan at the microphones" said Adena Gilbert, "but you also reach voters who are listening to the candidate."

"If we can get something off the ground here in the next few weeks, it's going to spread across the country," said Birmingham. With this snowball effect, the organization hopes candidates are dealing with the nuclear power issue

Pros and cons of SW fence confront Senate

By STEVEN SEMPLE
Collegian Staff

The Undergraduate Student Senate, in it's first meeting of the year, last night questioned and responded to members of the UMass Health Council and the University Planning Committee on the issue of the Massachusetts Avenue fence proposal.

Nearly all 49 senators present entered into the discussion involving building a pedestrian-control fence along the median of Massachusetts Avenue.

Addressing the meeting were Executive Director of Health Services Barry Averill, Campus Safety Officer Gilbert Mottler, along with Director of Planning, Jack Littlefield. All advocated the construction of the fence, as well as other campus safety features. Opposing the fence was Planning Committee member Richard Minear.

The men drew questions from the senate floor for nearly two hours in an effort to inform the campus, via the senators, of the many pros and cons involved in the action.

Student Government Co-President Rich LaVoice, invited both factions of the proposal to capsulize their views in a report that could be delivered to students. LaVoice also requested that senators bring the issue to their constituents in the form of meetings or questionnaires.

Southwest Assembly co-President Scott Shuster, said rerouting pedestrian traffic would only "alter the problem, not solve it." Shuster also called for reconsideration of other proposals that seemed, "rational, logical and reasonable," such as stop signs at heavy pedstrian traffic areas or an enforced lowered speed limit.

Shuster said the matter would be brought before the Southwest Assembly meeting Tuesday.

In his address to the senate, LaVoice asked for participation in a rally Saturday to protest registration for the draft. The rally will begin at noon, in front of the Student Union, and will proceed to Amherst Common where speakers will discuss the implications of the draft.

Union members attack double wage policy

By MARC FAGELSON
Collegian Staff

The University's maintenance workers' union is presently taking steps to eliminate their troublesome double wage pay policy, union leader John Tuttle said yesterday.

Tuttle was responding to charges by Steven Kozloski, head of the Physical Plant's Safety Department, that the union was condoning the University's present pay system which allows private contractors a higher wage than equally qualified union workers doing the same work.

Tuttle, President of the Association of Federal, State, County, and Municipal Employees Local 1776 described the double wage as "an obscenity."

The salary discrepancy could be remedied if the union brings its case to court to find out whether the little Davis-Bacon Act can be applied to University workers as well as workers from the private sector, Tuttle said.

The Act requires at least 80 percent of the prevailing union scale be paid to those workers from the private sector who are contracted to do public work, such as the renovation of the Brett Dormitory. It is uncertain, said Tuttle, whether the law applies to University employees when "contracted" by the Residential Resource Management department to do similar work.

Tuttle

The chance the case will go to court is good, but the court's decision is anybody's guess, he said.

Because much of the work is contracted by the Universi ty's Physical Plant, Tuttle believes the employees should be covered by the Davis-Bacon Act.

In a January 25 meeting Governor Edward King agreed the double wage plan should be eliminated, but the administration had not determined how to accomplish this, Tuttle said.

Another aspect of the double wage has to do with a union pact that included two separate pay scales. The pact discriminated against workers hired after Feb. 1, 1977, by paying workers hired before that date a disproportionately higher wage, Tuttle said.

An example of the wage imbalance is Bob Walsh, a janitor in Hasbrouck Laboratory building. He estimates since his March 1977 hiring he has lost approximately $3,500 in income that would have been his had he begun five weeks earlier.

Tuttle said Walsh's estimate was "conservative."

Shout delivers loud and clear

By CATHERINE RHEAUME
Special to the Collegian

Review

Alan Bates gives a powerful performance as a mystic with lethal powers in The Shout, an adaptation of Robert Graves' colorful exploration of human insanity.

Bates' character descends on a quiet village on the North Devon Coast of Britain and mysteriously imposes himself upon a neurotic composer (John Hurt) and his wife (Susannah York): Weilding a variety of aboriginal black arts, Bates terrifies the composer and seduces his wife. His primary weapon is the deadly "shout" which kills all those within earshot.

The tale is framed by a sanitorium criquet match reminiscent of Bates' earlier film, The King of Hearts. Bates, as the scorekeeper, narrates the tale. The incongruity of the motley collection of mad patients set against the formality of a criquet match is a striking parallel to the tale of occult magic in the quiet British village.

Like The King of Hearts, virtually every character in the film exhibits some degree of insanity. John Hurt is superb as the neurotic composer with a passion for amplified sound. The shepherd, a casualty of the "shout", is obviously deranged. Even the pastor seems slightly unbalanced in his halting sermon on the disintegration of morals.

Director Jerzy Skolimowski intercuts the two settings with brisk editing and an occasional lyrical touch of slow motion. As the film progresses, the criquet match becomes increasingly bizarre. The patients and staff become indistinguishable. The film draws to a close and the criquet match degenerates into chaos as a storm breaks.

The actual "shout" is the main course in a veritable feast for the ears. Skolimowski does not hesitiate to assault his audience with the soundtrack, the strong point of the film. Skolimowski shuns traditional musical scores in favor of a startling array of amplified sounds, ranging from a hornet buzzing to the piercing sound of ringing crystal. The effect is sometimes fascinating, sometimes painful, but always powerful.

Horseman a 'powerful' mix: plastic fantasy and frontier

By DEBBIE WALLACE
Collegian Staff

Review

Director Sydney Pollack has recaptured the romance and frontier excitement of vintage films in The Electric Horseman.

Once again, Robert Redford portrays a rebel in pursuit of the proverbial "bad guy"— a multi-million —dollar corporation that is exploiting a prize race horse. Jane Fonda is a stylish, cunning newswoman out to get a scoop who is won over by Redford's rustic appearance and humanitarian motives.

The soundtrack opens with a Willie Nelson song, "Mama Don't You Let Your Son Grow Up To Be A Cowboy" which sets the Western tone. The location of the film—glittery, neon Las Vegas, allows the viewer to slip into the film's fantasy. Las Vegas is the ideal location to highlight American commercialism and all our plastic dreams.

Fonda and Redford, both outspoken political activists, obviously accepted their roles because of the importance placed on the victimization of Americans by corporations. Corporate executives are portrayed as conniving, conservative fools. Yet, the heros prove that if people are willing to put their lives on the line, the individual will triumph.

Fonda and Redford complement one another well. Their characters and their acting styles succeed in creating a tense and sentimental interaction. Their romance is not overemphasized, however, and evolves much like a tender grammar school romance.

Tom Petty's overnight success: years in the making

Review

By MARC FAGELSON
Collegian Staff

The latest "overnight success" in rock, like most others, is not new to the scene at all. They almost made it two years ago with the single "Breakdown," but things didn't quite work out. However, with the release of their new album Damn the Torpedos, Tom Petty and the Heartbreakers have all the ingredients to be not only a critic's band, which they were until very recently, but a commercial success as well.

Like the great bands of the past and present, Petty and the Heartbreakers are convincing. They play tuneful yet powerful folkrock; it's strong enough to qualify them as power-pop. they don't take twenty-minute freak-out solos and somehow have escaped the sick pretentiousness that hinders so many American bands. They are not overproduced, and credit must go to Jimmy Iovine for that. Lastly, in keeping with our highly visual society, they look great in all their publicity shots.

Although Damn the Torpedos is not the band's best album, it is their most listenable. Gone are songs like "Luna;" the sparse sound has been replaced by fuller, more sensible numbers like "Shadow of a Doubt."

The album's single, "Refugee," entered the Billboard charts last week at 63 with a bullet. This track in particular showcases the production of Iovine, who mixed the guitar sound down and the keyboards up loud.

"Here Comes My Girl" is vintage Petty; it's one of his best love songs. His songs about women, although sometimes twisted, are consistently his best. Here, he uses some obvious vocal inflections to get his point across.

Oftentimes the songs are more pleas than demands or put-downs. On "Don't Do Me Like That" the listener realizes Petty doesn't have to shut someone else down to gain the upper hand. Sometimes an honest plea works just as well.

For Petty and the band, it's been a long one and a half years between releases. But the wait seems worth it. Damn the Torpedos confirms Tom Petty and the Heartbreakers have arrived this time for real.

Editorial/Opinion

More problems—no complaints

In my past two semesters at this humble institution, I have noticed that these pages have been used for an awful lot of complaining. Every day, someone would be arguing over some innane point that someone else had made in the previous days' editorial. And for the next several days, back and forth, it would be bitch, bitch, bitch. Now, I am just as aware as the next guy that there ar many problems plaguing us both on the campus level and nationwide, but you won't find me using the media to whine about them. Even though it ticks me off, you'll never find me complaining about...

Goons that play their stereos at sound levels at which they wouldn't allow the Concorde to land.

Heartless cashiers in the Coffee Shop who refuse to make change for pinball junkies when the change machine in the arcade is on the fritz...

MICHAEL MARTINEAU

Professors who think they're being funny when they tell their students that they should be taking Afghani instead of their class because they'll be needing it soon...

The T.O.C.'s ad that says "All ages welcome" when they have someone at the door to turn away anyone under twenty...

Or the fact that the people who run the "Cash for Books" scam in the Textbook Annex should be wearing masks and carrying guns.

No matter how much it annoys me, I'll never utter a word about...

Pizza that arrives two hours late, cold, and sliced in an odd number of off center pieces...

The neon menu in the Coffee Shop which has been discovered to cause sterility and/or insanity in laboratory mice...

Any building on campus that's leaking, falling down, giving radiation, sinking, or all of the above...

There won't be any moaning from me over the otherwise talented Dan Guidera's affinity for the word "lobotomy"...

The very existence of Edward J. King...

To say nothing of Jimmy Carter...

Not to mention Jimmie Walker...

Or Susie Chapstick, Lee Majors, Gary Coleman, T.V. Commercials, "In Search Of..." movies, high sports salaries, tuition hikes, D.C. food, eight o'clock classes, Theater 160, finals, noise in Southwest, or anything happening in countries that end with the letters "an."

Of course, columnists that blithely toss praise about are just as guilty, but I promise you'll never read here how much I appreciate...

P.V.T.A. buses, especially the Campus Shuttle (when they're on time)...

H.R.'s that serve free coffee during finals week...

Munchies stores (if they stayed open later)...

The Old Chapel, one of the few buildings on campus that isn't an eyesore...

Cheap movies...

Spring, and the return of the swans to the pond...

Dan Guidera's editorial cartoons...

The Campus Center Arcade, The Dream Machine, and, for the late night Southwest pinball junkie, the machines in Hampden Dining Commons...

Southwest's lowrises...

Sunsets in the valley...

The Red Sox, Bruins, Celtics and Patriots...

There are students on this campus, with a pressing need for literate, provocative journalism, and in line with fullfilling that need, a columnist has the responsibility not to fall into a rut, turning out predictable products.

For example, a common columnist's trick when writer's block hits is the Self-Indulgent Autobiographical Column, which is written under the guise of being a human-interest, color piece. I have the sensitivity and respect for the readership not to resort to that. I feel fortunate in that it was something that my parents instilled in me from day one. I remember it as if it were yesterday...

I was born on July 26, 1959, in Cambridge, Mass. They tell me it was an easy birth. I was a precocious child. My parents tell me that when I was three, I...

ELVED OWENS

As modest as...egotism

The Textbook Annex: Students busily accumulating the textbooks which they will be busily ignoring for the rest of the semester. Buying books does calm the soul, just as Xeroxing articles serves as a comforting substitute for the pain of reading them. I know that when I say I have read a book or article this can often be translated as: I have the book or article close at hand. Other euphemisms for blatant neglect apply: "I have glanced at it." (Translation: "It holds my door open."); "I have dipped into it." (Translation: "Looking for my Vote McGovern bookmark one day, damn me, there it was."); "I've been meaning to re-read it." (Translation: "I forgot to read it the first time 'round"), which are all ways of avoiding the confession that the title is a stranger, or that your eyes glazed-over just past contents.

This kind of bone idleness is, of course, disgraceful, but there are common features of textbooks which, I suspect, irritate even the keenest of students. Features such as the academic preface or acknowledgement. There is an almost Oriental convention of politeness about these; the author apologizes for producing such a miserably inadequate work and gushes thanks to various colleagues who, despite his unworthiness, deigned to help him out of the mess he was in. Some, to their credit, keep their humility under control: A brisk list of helpers ranging from eminent scholars to Miss Winthrop and Miss Belisha for the typing, and "my dear wife" is concluded with a terse, legal-sounding and slightly noble statement of responsibility: "For all errors contained herein I am, of course, solely to blame." It's all very grave and fatalistic, as if the author realizes that all his cleverness will count for nothing at the hands of a reviewer who had a traumatic childhood, a hangover, or a grudge. But it doesn't sicken.

The gushers are less bearable. They seem to go on and on apologizing for a work which, nevertheless, they have allowed to go to press. There is a kind of vanity, and a dishonest vanity at that, in toiling hard in the competitive academic world, sometimes for years, to produce what is some kind of monument and then to declare in the preface that it is a lousy, flawed work. It is as if the satisfaction of completing the thing can be indulged all the more by disowning its obvious brilliance.

It wouldn't be any more edifying but it might make a refreshing change to open a textbook and read a preface which said something like: "This book is all mine. I sweated blood over it for years despite jealousy and derision from some of my colleagues and a total lack of co-operation from that selfish bastard at Rutgers who had all the files I needed. It was a beast to write. My wife, when sober, went back to her mother's on a number of occasions, and my kids don't know me, but it's finished and I'm proud of it. If you don't like it write a better book yourself because I'm not going through that hell again. Thanks to Miss Winthrop and Miss Belisha for the typing."

It would be very easy to dislike anyone with the mean-spirit to write such a preface, but I'm not sure I would dislike him much more than the smug character who indulges in the "Forgive me, I am unworthy," spiel, when what he is really saying is: "Not only am I brilliant, I am brilliantly modest." Modesty, like salt, is only good when it is a pinch; too much and it becomes, itself, a kind of boasting.

Circular logic gives another impression

To the Editor:

Misleading statements in the January 28th article on enrollment lead the reader to believe that there has been a drop in the demand for public higher education. Admissions director Kedesdy said that because we are admitting fewer students means enrollment is declining. This is circular logic. The number of actual enrollments indicates nothing except that the university has decided to limit the number of students. On the contrary, the real issue is the number of prospective students who apply and are turned away every semester.

While we recognize the decline in college aged people in this country, we also recognize that increased inflation and declining incomes have turned many students who would have been private college-bound to apply instead to public colleges and universities.

Since most working class and middle class people today cannot afford $8,000 per year at Boston University, the demand and need for low-cost quality public higher education is greater than ever. By limiting access through higher costs and decreasing enrollment, the state is squeezing out students instead of making the necessary committment to meet their needs.

Amnesty member's concern: Iran's people, not hostages

To the Editor:

In Tuesday's Collegian a member of Amnesty International wrote a letter complaining about all sorts of atrocities which have occurred in Iran. Of course Amnesty is opposed to the alleged crimes of the Shah; but it also frowns on the political trials which have taken place since the Shah left power. Well fine; now we know that Amnesty has a soft spot in its heart for the average Iranian citizen. But isn't it strange that not one sentence of the member's letter mentioned the American hostages in Iran? Isn't it strange that this American member of Amnesty International doesn't give a damn about her own American countryman?

It's time that Americans started looking out for themselves and America started looking out for itself.

League urges voters to register

The League of Women Voters reminds all citizens eighteen years of age or older that Feb. 5 is the deadline to register to vote in the Presidential Primaries.

If you are a new resident, there is no waiting period to qualify for registration.

If you move within the community, you should submit your new address in writing to the Town Clerk's office.

Be sure that you are registered as an independent or for the party of your choice so that you can vote for the candidate you want to support. For example, if you are registered as a Democrat, you cannot vote in the Republican primary; you must change your registration to Republican or independent in order to do this.

Amherst residents may register any weekday between 8:00 a.m. and 4:30 p.m. in the Town Clerk's office. A special session is being held on Tues. Feb. 5th in the Campus Center from 9:00 a.m. to 3:00 p.m.

Black family life topic of discussion

Black women and men are invited to gather to discuss the nature of their relationships. Under the direction of Oare Dozier, the group will explore ways to come together. The unifying theme of the discussions will be Black Family Life In Our Future. Ms. Dozier is offering one to six credits to interested participants through the School of Education. Meetings will take place in North Amherst.

For further information contact Oare Dozier at Everywoman's Center.

Oare Dozier, a Black woman working with the counseling program in Everywoman's Center, is interested in having Black women who want to form a support group contact her at Wilder Hall. The Everywoman's Center is open from 9 a.m. to 7 p.m., Monday through Friday. It is located on the second floor of Wilder Hall, which is west of the Health Center. Drop in and leave your name, address and telephone number, or call and leave a message with the Resource and Referral staff women.

Women plan week

The International Women's Week organizing committee is open to suggestions and proposals from interested individuals and groups. Women from other colleges, and organizations planning their own activities for International Women's Week (March 2 to 8) are invited to cooperate with UMass organizers by helping to compile a program of events for the Valley.

A list of the programs and activities must be submitted to Jamila Gaston at Everywoman's Center before Feb. 4.

Women's jobs open

Everywoman's Center has an opening for women interested in developing administrative skills. The position will be supervised by the administrative coordinator, and includes compiling data for the center's Annual Report, reorganization of the files, and making contacts with University personnel.

Credits may be arranged. For further information, contact Susan Tracy at the Center.

Older students info

Older women and non—traditional students may find that meeting each other and sharing information increases the ability of each individual to negotiate University bureaucracy more easily. For more information, call Dorothy Howard at the Older Students Network, 5—0334.

The Student Development and Counseling Center and Everywoman's Center will co—sponsor a support group for older women and non—traditional students to begin in February.

Quality without Clydesdales.

Honestly, we have nothing against corporate cavalry.
We regard it with affection. It's a quaint anachronism. Like royalty in American beer slogans.
But, to nit pick for a moment, we've been brewing Schmidt's fifteen years longer. And age has taught us wisdom.
True beer drinkers don't really care how you get it there. Just so you deliver the quality.

Schmidt's
The beer that might make Philadelphia famous.

even after they leave the new England primaries.

According to speakers last night, the campaign has been pressing candidates across the ideological spectrum. "We should egg on Brown as well as Reagan," said Birmingham.

Magid said, "We are not going to be disruptive. We want to get the attention of the public, the media and the candidates. Magid said "Students are a phenomenally powerful group," but stresses the organization is seeking broad—based support which includes students."

★ Shout

The Shout has a complex plot which leaves the viewer not quite certian if Bates' tale is factual, or merely the product of a deranged mind.

Skolimowski produces a world of bizarre characters and occult mysticism which is a frightening comment on society's definition of insanity.

The Shout will be playing at the Pleasant Street Theatre until Feb. 5.

New Students Program

The New Students' Program is now accepting applications for student counselors in the Summer Counseling Program to run June 1-July 22. Applications may be obtained at the Student Development/Counseling Center in Berkshire House and must be returned before Feb. 8.

Qualifications include successful work experience, a positive attitude toward University life, good academic performance and a high energy level.

Training sessions for the 30 counselors will be required and held in late spring and immediately before the program begins, May 27-30. Eleven sessions for first-year students and five transfer sessions will be held, and dormitory residence is required of all counselors as are meals in dining commons for the duration of the program.

Networks reject unflattering ad

NEW YORK (AP)—What is more profitable-an oil company or a television network? Mobil Corp. says a network is, and it made a television commercial saying so. The networks say they will not run the commercial.

"I think it's censorship," Mobil executive vice president Herbert Schmertz said yesterday. "I don't think their motivation is to censor, but that is the result."

The networks said the decision to reject the ad was based on long-standing policies against airing commercials on controversial public issues and had nothing to do with the discussion of their profits. NBC also challenged the relevance of the comparison.

★ Iran

Since the victory of Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini's revolution a year ago, militants in Kurdistan have clashed repeatedly with security forces in an effort to win greater autonomy for their region.

The new fighting broke out just a day after the Khomeini regime gave in to one Kurdish demand and withdrew revolutionary guards from the Kurdish city of Sanandaj. After the withdrawal, the Kurds ended a month-long general strike and a sit-in at the provincial governor-general's office.

The Kurdistan violence and other developments in Tehran yesterday were reliably reported by Western journalists in the Iranian capital.

The escape of the six American diplomats, disclosed Tuesday morning in the West, was not reported to the general public in Tehran until midday yesterday, when newspapers gave it front-page treatment.

The half-dozen Americans had avoided capture when the U.S. Embassy was seized Nov. 4 by the militants, who still demand return of the deposed Shah Mohammad Reza Pahlavi in exchange for their prisoners' freedom.

"It is too early to answer this question," he said. "Much would depend on where the games would be located, how many nations would agree to participate, and what contributions we might be able to obtain from others."

Ledsky suggested the competition could be held at one or more sites overseas, perhaps in some Third World country.

Spikers start season with weekend action

By MAUREEN SULLIVAN
Collegian Staff

Last year, the men's volleyball team played well; it dominated its division, which included Amherst College, Williams, Berkshire Community, and Middlebury. Only a close loss to Yale in the quarterfinals of the New England Open prevented it from dominating that as well.

However, the team lacked the power to "put it away"; its incredible amount of potential was not really tapped. The players served well, and their overall play on the court was pretty good. But behind the moves existed little true power, little depth. Teams like Springfield College handled UMass fairly easily; even Amherst College found a way to spoil a perfect division record.

But that was last year. This year, things are different. Very different, indeed.

Beginning with a scrimmage against U.S. Volleyball Association power Greenfield Friday night, and intensifying this weekend with two division–wide Jamborees, the UMass squads will begin a season filled with the challenges of meeting some of the East's best squads.

Starting its season under first–year coach Al Morel, the varsity will make its debut Sunday in Durham, New Hampshire, when it faces host UNH, Harvard, Northeastern, Rhode Island, Boston University, and MIT in the New England Collegiate Volleyball League (NECVL) Division One Jamboree. The junior varsity, also under the leadership of Morel, will host the Division II Jamboree at NOPE gym this coming Saturday. Among the teams participating in this Jamboree will be teams formerly played by the varsity — — Amherst, Williams, Middlebury, and Worcester Polytech. Dartmouth College, Tufts, and Bryant College round out the list of Division II teams expected at NOPE.

"The Jamborees will give us a chance to get our players ready for the season," said Morel, "We'll get some playing experience against our division rivals as well as getting used to each other's styles of play."

After the Jamborees, the varsity will face such teams as NECVL defending champion Harvard and runner–up Northeastern in a tri–match, New England powers Springfield College and Yale, West Point, and nationally–ranked Penn State.

"This is an excellent schedule," said Morel, "and I know we'll do very well this season. We've got the depth this year; there are five good setters, including Pat Ryan, Ed Midura, Orlando Larracuente and Darryl Cain. Pat, especially. I've seen nobody who could set as well as Pat. He's probably one of the best overall players in New England.

"Also, the team's been practicing very hard and conditioning itself to endure those long tourneys coming up later this season. Thanks to the intensive conditioning program we've been using, the team's developed more power and endurance.

Many of the team members are freshmen or sophomores. Two freshmen — — — Pepe Alvarez and Quique Callabero — — — were on Puerto Rico's championship high school team last year. Sophomore Pat Ryan received All–Star honors on the division squad last year. Larracuente and Midura, both seniors, should help the varsity to a fine record in both the NECVL Division One and the Eastern Collegiate Volleyball League.

As for the JVs? "Nobody in the league has a JV program like we do," said Morel. "They add a great amount of depth to the team. Steve Geryk and Kim Biechelle, along with everyone else, will make this season an outstanding one for both squads.."

Hoopwomen face Friars: New England showdown

By MIKE ESTRADA
Collegian Staff

If the women's basketball team's recent win against Springfield College marked its return to consistency, tonight's game could mark its return to the top of the New England College womens' poll.

UMass travels to Providence college for a 7:00 game agianst the Friars. At 12–3, Providence finds itself ranked number one for the first time in its history, the spot held by the Minutewomen for most of this season.

Umass is currently riding a three–game winning streak that is actually its longest of the season and the best showing since being 4–1 at the start of January. The early part of the month was not kind to the Minutewomen as they had a stretch of 3–5.

If tonight marks a return to supremacy for UMass, it will bemanifested in the culmination of playbe manifested t and the disregard of injuries. Junior Ginger Legare is playing her best basketball of the season the last two games, including a thirteen–point explosion in the second half against Springfield.

Two freshman guards are seeing a lot of playing time since Sherry Collins hurt her back. Valerie DePaolo improves with experience and Marlene Susienka, coming off an injury herself, assumed the third guard role well, showing a great deal of poise against Springfield.

Add the consistency of Sue Peters and Tricia Corcoran coupled with the effective eight–foot jump shot of Julie Ready and there is the basis for a team to go down the stretch. After Providence, the Minutewomen play three straight home games before travelling to Maine on Feb. 16.

Providence is led by Lynn Sheedy and Mary Ann McCoy, who both score over 11 points per game. The Friars nipped Boston College in their most recent game 46–45.

Lee tickets available

Tickets for Bill Lee's Wednesday night speaking engagement are available Friday, Monday and Tuesday on the Campus Center concourse. The event, sponsored by the Distinguished Visitors Program, takes place at the Fine Arts Center Wednesday at 8 p.m.

Lewis Geffen of DVP expects tickets to see the former Boston Red Sox pitcher, who was the winningest left-handed pitcher in the National League last season, will go quickly.

Geffen says students wanting tickets must have a valid University ID in order to receive a ticket and that the ID is necessary to get into FAC as well.

Bruins appeal denied

By FRED GOODALL
AP Sports Writer

CHICAGO – The National Hockey League Board of Governors on Wednesday unanimously upheld the suspensions and fines of Boston Bruin players for their part in an altercation with fans in New York last month.

The vote was taken during a three-hour special meeting at which three of the players Terry O'Reilly, Peter McNab and Mike Milbury – and Bruins' president Paul Mooney presented their side of the case.

NHL president John A. Ziegler suspended O'Reilly for eight games and McNab and Milbury six games each for their part in the brawl Dec. 23 in Madison Square Garden which spread into the stands and involved a group of fans.

In addition to the suspensions without pay, all three players were fined $500 each. Also fined the NHL maximum of $500 each were Al Secord, Craig MacTavish, John Wensink and Gilles Gilbert.

All the other Bruins in uniform that night, with the exception of goalie Gerry Cheevers, were fined $200 each.

JANET 1606 28 pcs part two The incident erupted after a Bruins-New York Rangers game when a fan leaned over the boards and struck Boston player Stan Jonathan. Another spectator grabbed a player's stick and began swinging it, eventually striking O'Reilly, who climbed into the stands, he said, to subdue the fan.

Former UMass hoopster forges a winner at BU

With the face of a cherub, Rick Pitino is guiding a Boston University team he calls the 12 "altar boys" to Eastern basketball prominence.

"I call them my altar boys because they work so hard at practice and at school that they don't have time to get in any trouble," Pitino says. "I, however, am the meanest guy to ever walk on the basketball court."

Pitino means it. He is 27, looks 17-years-old and acts seven while coaching the Terriers: prancing, dancing, ranting, raving and even occasionally behaving along the B.U. bench. The combination of hard work and constant enthusiasm has earned B.U., a school always known more for hockey, a 14-1 record, the best among Eastern independents.

In his season and a half at B.U., Pitino, last year's New England Coach of the Year, has lost only 10 games, unheard of at the private university of 20,000 which hasn't had a strong basketball team for 25 years.

"I have great respect for any coach on this level," Pitino says. "I don't think anyone can out-coach anyone else. But we can out-work them. We pride ourselves on being the hardest working team in the country."

The team's attitude is an extension of its coach's. Only 5- foot-10, Pitino learned early only his enthusiasm and guile could make him succeed in a big man's game. After a successful high school career on Long Island playing for St. Dominic High, Pitino went on to play at the University of Massachusetts (on one team with Julius Erving). He still holds several UMass assist records.

In 1975-76, Pitino became an interim head coach at the University of Hawaii, one of the youngest men ever to coach a major college team. A year later, he went to Syracuse as an assistant to Jim Boeheim.

"I learned a lot about bigtime basketball at Syracuse," Pitino says. "I think I learned the things I have to know to get B.U. to that level."

Pitino was Syracuse's ace recruiter. Smooth-talking, immaculately polished and sporting a three-piece suit, Pitino looked as if he had walked out of a fashion display in Playboy. And he was able to make Syracuse, bleak and often snowbound in the winter, sound like ShangriLa.

"I was hired for the job the same time I got married, and instead of going on a honeymoon I went out to Cincinnati to recruit Louis Orr. I stayed there three weeks and got him," Pitino says of the slender Orr, now a key player on Syracuse's highly-ranked team. Pitino was also able to coax lightning-quick guard Eddie Moss to Syracuse.

"He's changed the way people regard basketball at B.U.," Boeheim declares. "He's young, and he's been able to really relate to the players, but he's very disciplined, too. I think he was the perfect guy for the job."

At B.U., Pitino had to figure out how to turn a 10-15 team, short on talent and desire, into a winner that would draw more than 500 people a game. "When I first got here I told the juniors and seniors that they would play, instead of starting the freshmen I recruited. Now, everybody plays," Pitino says. B.U. uses a full-court press throughout all its games and aims to run the fast break every chance it gets. The whole squad plays to keep everyone fresh, with Pitino directing the frequent substitutions like a traffic cop in Tokyo. The subs on the bench are constantly on a yo-yo–rising in unison to clap a teammate's basket, or rebound, or blocked shot. They sit down only regretfully. The team has started to draw crowds close to 4,000 for home games.

Students to oppose registration

By ED LEVINE
Collegian Staff

Five College area students will display their opposition to President Jimmy Carter's proposal for selective service registration with a rally tomorrow.

The demonstration is scheduled to begin at 12 noon at the campus pond. The demonstrators then plan a march to the Amherst Common where several speakers are scheduled to address the crowd.

This demonstration follows a similar action which took place last Friday when about 100 area students rallied on the town common in opposition to draft registration.

The rally is being sponsored by the Anti-Draft Coalition, an informal group of students from the five college area, along with Students Against The Draft, a newly formed UMass group.

"We are trying to form a Five College coalition which will connect with other groups nationwide," said James Haug of the Student Center for Educational Research and Advocacy and a coordinator of SAD. Haug said the demonstrators will seek signatures on a petition to be sent to lawmakers in Washington urging the rejection of any registration proposal.

Last Friday approximately 500 signatures were collected on a similar petition at the rally on Amherst Common, said Thomas Stoner, a Hampshire College student who assisted in organizing the rally.

"We are opposed to registration because it would lead to the draft," Stoner said. "None of us want to go to war. We want to see the process abandoned."

Students, shown here rallying last Friday, will gather once again on Saturday to protest the proposed registration for the draft. (Staff photo by Jim Mahoney)

Draft proposal draws opposition

By ELLEN NIMMONS
Associated Press

President Carter's call for draft registration is prompting old anti-war hands to join in protests with students who were grade schoolers when the nation's campuses erupted in opposition to the Vietnam War.

"Suddenly this is very personal," said an unidentified woman at a protest rally that drew a thousand people at Harvard University. "My brother burned his draft card in 1968 and now it's my turn."

Around the nation, ad hoc groups were set up – many with roots in Quaker organizations or in anti-war organizations of the 1960s – to stage protest marches and rallies. Demonstrations began after Carter's State of the Union address on Jan. 23, and more are scheduled in California, Michigan, Texas and Missouri.

At Harvard and the University of Michigan in Ann Arbor, "Hell no, we won't go" was the familiar refrain Wednesday; at Columbia University, about 50 pro-draft and anti-draft protesters scuffled over the American flag during an anti-draft rally that drew 500 people.

At some campuses, support for the president ran high. Sixty-seven percent of those questioned in a random telephone survey by the Ohio State University student government said they backed draft registration. And 63 percent said women should be required to register.

But at the University of California at Berkeley, a similar survey showed 68 percent of those questioned opposed reinstatement of the draft. Carter has not suggested reinstituting the draft, however.

"It's kind of a deja vu for me," said the Rev. Richard Dannenfelser, Brown University's assistant chaplain, as about 300 students packed a campus auditorium Wednesday for a discussion set up by an-

Hiring freeze: Students hit?

By JACK GALLAGHER
and ED LEVINE
Collegian Staff

The verdict is still out as to whether "03" student workers will be affected by an edict issued Monday by UMass President David C. Knapp that freezes employment hirings on the Boston, Worcester and Amherst campuses.

Larry Benedict, acting associate to the Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs Dennis L. Madson, last night said full-time 01 and 02 workers, will be hired only on a "critical-need basis." Those seeking full-time employment, he said, must be approved by Chancellor Henry Koffler before being hired.

The order to freeze hiring was issued by UMass President David C. Knapp in response to a hiring freeze imposed by Gov. Edward J. King.

The order to freeze hiring was issued by Knapp in response to a hiring freeze imposed by Gov. Edward J. King, said Art Clifford of the UMass News Bureau.

"I don't know if students will be involved...probably not," Benedict said, adding Madson's office is waiting to hear from Knapp. Benedict said 01 and 02 employment has been semi-frozen since last summer.

Benedict said if the freeze does apply to 03 workers, Koffler will have much more paper work than he now does. The vice chancellor's office has handled 01 and 02 personnel transactions this week, he said, which now must go through the chancellor's office.

Benedict said the vice chancellor's office received a copy of Knapp's edict by Telecopier Monday afternoon.

The category numbers refer to the classification of University personnel. Employees classified 01 are full-time professional staff who are hired on a contract basis. 02 workers are also full-time staff, but they are hired on a yearly basis with their employment subject to review each year. 03 employees are temporary employees assigned on a yearly basis.

"It looks like we'll be in a situation where we will not be able to hire in any category unless they are filling a critical need as determined by the Chancellor," Clifford said.

Clifford said the criteria would eliminate hiring for most positions. "I think 99 percent of the people eligible to be hired won't fit the criteria," he added.

New dollar coin promoted

ADAMS (AP) — The new Susan B. Anthony dollar, spurned by an American public accustomed to folding money, will get a boost Friday when post offices throughout the country begin stocking the coin.

"It's a nationwide campaign to promote the Anthony dollar," said John E. Wilk, postmaster in the hometown of the 19th century suffragette. Miss Anthony was born in Adams on Feb. 15, 1820.

The coin made its appearance last July 2, representing the first time an American woman was depicted on a U.S. coin intended for general circulation.

Although the coin was popular at first with collectors and souvenir hunters, it failed to gain acceptance with the general public, apparently because it resembles a quarter

CBS number one in ratings

NEW YORK (AP) — CBS claims first place in the primetime television ratings for the first time in nearly four years. But the network's programming chief says he expects the Winter Olympics next month to put ABC back on top for the rest of the season.

"I have to give the odds to ABC," said Robert A. Daly, president of CBS's entertainment division, "because I feel the Winter Olympics they'll carry in February will tip the balance in their favor.

"ABC has not been doing well lately," Daly said in a telephone conversation from his office in Los Angeles, "and the Olympics will give them an opportunity to break our momentum, and to promote their programs for the rest of the season.

"But it will be close," Daly said, "and we've got to be pleased with the building blocks we've put in place for next season."

Government clamps down

Fighting in Iran kills 50

Associated Press

A fresh outbreak of fighting between Kurdish rebels and government forces has taken at least 50 lives in western Iran, a rebel spokesman said yesterday. In Tehran the revolutionary government clamped down on demonstrations in an apparent effort to head off further clashes between leftists and their foes.

The new bloodshed was reported as signals grew stronger that some progress may be possible in resolving the U.S. Embassy standoff and winning freedom for the approximately 50 American hostages in Tehran, who spent their 89th day in captivity Thursday.

Optimism in Washington focused on a "package deal" U.N. Secretary-General Kurt Waldheim has been trying to work out whereby the United Nations would launch an investigation of the alleged crimes of the ousted Shah Mohammad Reza Pahlavi, and the Moslem militants holding the embassy would free the hostages.

A U.N. spokesman said at noon Thursday Waldheim had been in contact with Iranian authorities in the previous 24 hours. He gave no details, but said he might have more to divulge by Friday.

It was not known whether Waldheim was in touch with Iranian Foreign Minister Sadegh Ghotbzadeh, his previous contact, with President-elect Abolhassan Bani Sadr or with some other Iranians.

The militants occupying the embassy have insisted throughout the crisis that they will not release their captives unless the shah is returned to Iran.

The new violence in Kurdistan was the latest in a series of battles over the past year between Kurdish militants and the revolutionary guards of Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini's Tehran regime. The Kurds are seeking greater local rule for their region.

A rebel spokesman in the Kurdish city of Sanandaj, reached by telephone by a Western journalist in Tehran, said most of the 50 or more dead and scores wounded in two days of fighting were revolutionary guardsmen. The spokesman, who declined to be identified, said the clashes occurred in the towns of Kamyaran, Bijar and Paveh.

His account could not be otherwise confirmed, but reports reaching Tehran on Wednesday had spoken of at least 10 deaths.

Dariush Forouhar, a government representative on a "goodwill mission" that has been trying to restore peace to Kurdistan, contacted two Kurdish leaders by telephone in an effort to establish a cease-fire, Tehran Radio said in a broadcast monitored in London.

Carter thanks Canadian leader

By FRANK CORMIER
Associated Press

WASHINGTON (AP) — President Carter thanked Prime Minister Joe Clark yesterday for Canada's help in getting six U.S. diplomatic employees out of Iran, and said he doubts the escape will cause harm to American hostages there.

Carter expressed his gratitude in a telephone call to Clark, whose embassy in Tehran used faked Canadian passports and Iranian visas to spirit the six Americans out of the country last weekend.

The president termed Canada's action "a tremendous exhibition of friendship and support, and I think personal and political courage."

Congress adopted resolutions of gratitude to Canada on Wednesday, and Canada's embassy here and consulates around the country were besieged with countless telephone calls expressing thanks.

Clark told Carter he hoped that disclosure of the secret operation by Jean Pelletier, a Washington correspondent for a Montreal newspaper, La Presse, would not endanger the 50 Americans held captive by Iranian militants in Tehran.

"I don't believe that the revelation of their departure (from Iran) will be damaging to the well-being of our other hostages," Carter replied. "You are nice, and very perceptive, to express that concern."

Five reporters listened to Carter's end of the conversation and the president told them what Clark said.

Carter disclosed that he and Clark had been exchanging secret messages, sometimes by telephone, since early November — soon after the six escaped to friendly diplomatic territory when the militants seized the U.S. Embassy in Tehran Nov. 4, demanding return of the shah of Iran for trial.

In talking to Clark Thursday, Carter reminisced about earlier conversations, which he said were conducted "sometimes almost in verbal code" to foil any eavesdroppers.

At the Sate Department, spokesman Hodding Carter said he was unable to elaborate on a statement Wednesday by Sen. Frank Church, D-Idaho, that there is "some grounds for hoping" that a way might be found to obtain the hostages' release.

Spokesman Carter said there was no reason to believe a breakthrough was imminent in the 89-day-old crisis. He reaffirmed the United States will accept no settlement which does not begin with release of the hostages.

"What we are seeking is a responsible government willing to do what we've been seeking," the spokesman said.

Carter's restraint praised

Profs give opinions on draft

By JOAN McKENZIE
Collegian Staff

"I only hope that because of the blunder we made in Vietnam that the American people don't think it is not necessary to fight a war. The Persian Gulf is a vital interest to the United States in a way Vietnam was not," said Glen Gordon, chairman of the UMass Political Science Department.

Gordon was one of three UMass professors interviewed this week for their reactions to President Jimmy Carter's State of the Union address.

"I have always been in favor of the draft. I thought is was a mistake to stop the draft. I feel a volunteer army has a potential for being dangerous to the United States. If there is a war everyone should have to go. There should be no exemptions for anybody," Gordon said.

He added that if women are drafted it may be an advantage by making society less militaristic.

Gordon said Carter is doing a good job handling the Iranian crisis.

"Do you think the Russians would have negotiated with the Iranians if the hostages were Russians? They would have gone in shooting and gotten them out. Our style is different, all the more reason not to go in shooting," he said. "We were complaining before that we have a macho style Presidency with Nixon and Ford and now that we don't have a macho style president we are still complaining."

I have always been in favor of the draft. I thought it was a mistake to stop the draft.

—Prof. Gordon

Carter has practiced restraint and in this instance, restraint is much better than overreaction.

—Prof. Reid

Jamieson Reid, executive officer of the Political Science Department who is teaching the American Presidency this semester, said it is better to try to negotiate with the Soviet Union than to sit by and not voice protest.

"Carter has to take a stand. We have to let him know how we feel," he said.

Regarding Iran, Reid said "Carter has practiced restraint and in this instance, restraint is much better than overreaction. There is a better chance of the hostages being released. If we had gone into Iran and used military force we would have made a martyr out of Khomeini. Also, there are factions in Iran who want to get rid of the present system and if we wait and continue to practice restraint, they may oust the Ayatollah, he said

"He didn't go far enough. He still exhibited his off and on manner of acting," said Economics Professor Vaclav Holesovsky. Holesovsky, an expert in the field of Soviet and Eastern European Economics, suggested penalties for the Soviets.

"Why stop at 75 percent boycott of exportation of high technology equipment? Why not make it 100 percent? More important, why not include boycotting deliveries to non-Soviet European countries who make things for the Soviets and need high technology input from the West in order to satisfy the Soviets? By not stopping exportation to non-Soviet European countries who deal with the Soviets, we are in effect strengthening Soviet economy enough to be able to increase threats of war and make war possible. We are pampering our adversary. First we build him up, then we have to shoot him down," Holesovsky said.

In his State of the Union address Carter stated that "any attempts by the Soviet Union to gain control of the Persian Gulf will be regarded as an assault on the vital interests of the United States and will be repelled by any means necessary, including military force."

"He phrased it badly," Holesovsky said. "He should have included the vital interests of Western Europe and Japan. They are much more interested in free access to the Persian Gulf. Carter should have addressed the welfare of the entire world. It is not our private American concern. He didn't make that clear. It was a tactical mistake."

Holesovsky also said he favors a proposal which would decentralize the Olympics.

"They never should have been in Moscow. The Olympics are supposed to be in a country which recognizes the rights of its citizens. Moscow did not qualify. However, it is not practically feasable to move the Olympics to a new place. Therefore each discipline should be performed in a different town throughout the world," he said.

Of the Olympic controversy, Gordon said "the games have always been used to prove the superiority of a governmental system. I don't think we should lend legitimacy to a regime by attending the Olympics. Somebody has to sacrifice, in this case the athletes, but this sacrifice wil benefit the United States as a whole."

Why stop at 75 percent boycott? Why not make it 100 percent?

Men for women's rights, wary of ERA

By DEBBIE ROBERTI
Collegian Staff

One of the most important events of the 1970's was the emergence of the women's movement. Women such as activist Gloria Steinem, and National Organization for Women President Ellen Smeal have gained the support of thousands. Because little has been said of how men feel about women's need for equality, the Collegian interviewed approxiamately 25 UMass men on such issues as the Equal Rights Amendment, women in the workplace, sexism and feminism.

Nearly all of the men questioned supported equal rights for both men and women, but only a small percentage supported the Equal Rights Amendment itself. Many described the amendment as "unnecessary," "useless," and a "disadvantage to women." These men also stated that they thought women were already gaining equality without the ratification of the amendment. However, the main reason behind the opposition was military. If the Equal Rights Amendment was passed, women could then be drafted. Ten out of the 25 men said that they did not approve of women in combat.

Richard Sloan, a transfer student from UMass in Boston said, "I support the ERA up to a point. I don't believe that women should have to go to war, which would happen should the ERA pass. I don't want to see my little sister on the battlefield."

Because women no longer expect solely to marry and to be housewives, men were asked how they felt about women working. All but one man said that women had a right to a career and that they should get the same pay as men. Only one man, who refused to give his name, felt that the Equal Rights Amendment was "dumb," and that "women should be wives, stay at home, cook, clean and have babies."

Sexism has always been a problem for women. Most men agreed that it hurts women, and when asked if they thought that it hurt men also, some said "no," a few said that it would probably come between male-female relationships, thus hurting both sexes, and the majority said that all prejudice attitudes damaged people in some way. Gene MacPhearson, a freshman, commented, "Sexism hurts anybody. It throws them into stereotyped roles that they can't rise above."

Feminism is the doctrine which declares the social, political, and economic rights of women to be the same for men. However, the word "feminist" conjurs up the image of an "outspoken, aggressive, militant lesbian," according to one man. When asked what

Student dies in fall from dormitory

An unidentified male senior fell to his death last night on the third floor landing of McNamara dormitory in the Sylvan Residential Area at approximately 10:15. No information was available at press time as to what caused the fall. Northeast Sylvan Area Director Jackie Lehemy denied comment, except to say, "There will be no information given until notification of next of kin and a complete medical statement by authorities is made."

A priest was at the scene.

The University police were still investigating the incident at press time. Four students were led out of the dormitory for questioning. Several students gathered in the lobby after the incident, but all refused to comment except for one unidentified female student who confirmed that the deceased was a McNamara resident in his senior year at the University.

Black Affairs

Black caucus takes stand

The Congressional Black Caucus issued guidelines recently for rating presidential candidates on issues ranging from jobs to foriegn policy.

Representative Cardiss Collins, D-Ill., head of the caucus, said the guidelines were sent to the candidates in hope of influencing their positions.

The guidelines represent generally liberal positions on domestic issues, urging a 5 percent increase above inflation for social programs and opposing recessionary economic policies.

Although the caucus' positions appear to conflict sharply with Carter administration policies, Collins repeatedly refused to comment on President Carter's performance in office.

The caucus, which contains both pre-Carter and pre-Kennedy elements, apparently hopes to avoid a split by remaining officially neutral on the race, as it has done before in the past. However, of the group's 17 members, Representatives Charles Rangel, D-N.Y., and Harold Ford, D-Tenn., have already endorsed Carter, while Representative Shirley Chisholm, D-N.Y., has endorsed Kennedy.

Despite the groups official neutrality on presidential politics, one member, Representative Ronald Dellums, D-Calif., criticized Carter's proposed 5 percent "real boost" in defense spending. Dellums told a news conference in December, that "President Carter has declared war on the poor, the cities of America and the human priorities of this nation."

The caucus guidelines for: a full-employment economy; policies to loosen credit; full financing for anti-recession job programs; expanded government housing programs; an "equitable" energy policy that does not use price to achieve conservation; a quality national health care plan for all Americans; a tripling government spending on education; an increase in the number of high-level black government officials; strong advocacy of civil rights; vigorous support of a national holiday to honor the late Rev., Martin Luther King Jr.; economic and political pressure against South Africa; and increased aid for African refugees.

Study: Parents needed to curb high school violence

BOSTON (AP) — A two-year national study of urban high schools released yesterday says parents and community leaders must be enlisted to turn the often violent city classroom back into a place of learning.

"You find that weapons offenses, rapes and even homicides are something that urban school administrators have to deal with," said Thomas J. Burns, a regional commissioner of the Department of Health, Education and Welfare.

"We must change this trend or face drastic problems in the '80s," he said.

The $250,000 study found that as white students flee to the suburbs or private schools, inner city schools are becoming racial battlegrounds.

Forty five percent of the students left behind in the city schools eventually drop out, the report said.

The report said teen-age unemployment in the inner city stands at 14.2 percent and is 37.1 percent among black youth.

Burns said teen-age pregnancy has become the leading factor for female students leaving school. He also cited a growing problem with drugs and weapons in schools and said one million acts of violence take place in the nation's schools each month.

The report, compiled following a series of conferences around the country, included 500 recommendations for school administrators, state, local and federal officials.

Burns said the recomendations fell into five broad categories, stressing the need for cooperation and participation between parents, teachers and administrators.

Burns also said urban schools should take advantage of museums, theaters and "work stations" set up in cooperation with local businessmen.

"The traditional school model of a six-hour day run by the bell must come to an end," he said.

"Whatever the price tag," said Burns, "it is one that society has to pay."

Thomas J. Burns, regional commissioner of the Department of Health, Education and Welfare, explains to reporters in Boston yesterday the findings of a two-year study of urban high schools. The study released yesterday says parents and community leaders must be enlisted to turn the often violent city classroom back into a place of learning. (AP Laserphoto)

METHENY

Tickets for the Feb. 24 appearance of Jazz artist Pat Metheney will go on sale today.

Metheney will be appearing in the Fine Arts Center Concert Hall. This performance is timed to follow the release of his latest album, American Garage.

Metheney first began his career at the University of Miami at age 18 when, after enrolling as a student, he was hired by the school to teach music. While teaching, Metheney also performed at the school with such jazz stars as Pearl Bailey and Della Reese.

In 1973 Metheney joined the faculty at the Berklee College of Music in Boston, becoming, at age 19, the youngest instructor in the history of the school. At the same time Metheney joined the Gary Burton Quintet, with whom he played for three years.

In May of 1976 Metheney released his first solo album, Bright Size Life, followed the next year by Watercolors, which topped Billboard Magazine's music charts for 30 weeks.

In January 1978 Metheney released his third album, Pat Metheney Group, and his most recent effort American Garage, was released in late 1979.

Appearing with Metheney will be Lyle Mays, from Wisconsin, drummer Dan Gottlieb from New York City, and bassist Mark Egan, who hails from Brockton, Mass.

Tickets for the show cost $7, $6.50 and $6 for students and $1 more for nonstudents and may be purchased at Tix in the Student Union lobby, Union Records Unlmited, Platterpus Records in Northampton, and the Fine Arts Center Box Office.

The Fine Art of Surfacing: Definitely an unusual album

By TOM ANDERSON
Collegian Music Editor

The Boomtown Rats
The Fine Art of Surfacing
(Columbia)

Review

New wave's rise to mass acceptance has meant two things for the music scene: a proliferation of instant young groups as well as the wider recognition of artists that have been around for several years. Among the groups in the latter category are Blondie, Tom Petty and the Heartbreakers and the Boomtown Rats, each of whom finally attained some level of stardom with their third album.

In the case of the Rats, The Fine Art of Surfacing is the breakthrough release. Their self-titled debut in 1977 was a tough, punkish collection which sold poorly and quickly ended up in the cutout racks. After a highly beneficial label switch, the Rats released A Tonic for the Troops, a combination of new songs and tunes from their first album. It was a fine effort but, again, commercial success eluded them.

Finally, right at the end of 1979 came Fine Art, a much more polished album than the previous two. There are two ways to approach this album. It is possible to take the perspective that they've to some extent "sold out" to the more commercial edge of new wave, typified by the Cars. However, a closer listen reveals that the Boomtown Rats are as irreverent as ever, and in fact seem to be parodying many of the styles they assume in the songs.

There are various perversions of love songs, including "Someone's Looking at You" and "Diamond Smiles." There are curious little tunes like "Wind Chill Factor (Minus Zero)" and "Sleep," which appear to be semi-serious excursions into the territory of the new wave intelligentsia like the Talking Heads. There are the Springsteenish essays on life in the city.

Good reefer as society's new cure-all

BILL HALLISEY

New research findings have spawned a resurgence of anti-marijuana sentiment among the nation's moms and dads. The latest propaganda is centered around claims that young pot smokers develop unhealthy behavior patterns characterized by apathy, self-centeredness, and escapism which inhibit their emotional and intellectual growth. The pot smoker becomes locked into a sort of perpetual adolescence. My mom took one look at me and had to agree.

It's time to set the record straight.

What's wrong with eternal youth? Men have been seeking the mythical fountain of youth ever since they realized what age was, and now they scorn when it comes knocking on their front door. Our real enemy is maturity—especially intellectual maturity. What have the great minds really given us? A malignant growth auspiciously called technology that has sapped our resources, polluted our air and water, allowed the population to surpass its food supply, and threatened us with a nuclear Armageddon.

Undoubtedly, good reefer would have prevented all this by keeping potential great minds in check. Apathy and egoism would have molded a world where nobody really cares about changing or improving things, and when Man stops trying to improve things he inevitably ceases to ruin them.

Is it too late for marijuana to save the world? I think not. Reefer is already at work solving the problem of overpopulation by sterilizing and lowering the sex drives of its heavy users. How the government can continually label these as some of the adverse side effects of smoking marijuana is beyond me. Any person who prefers not to put up with the pitter-patter of little feet can tell you that sterility is a very good thing to have.

People pay millions of dollars every year trying to be sterile. A lowered libido undoubtedly strengthens the user's moral composition also. Pot fights overpopulation on two fronts by disrupting the mating process as well as the insemination process. One jay is usually enough to render the smoker hopelessly dull, boring and/or paranoid, thereby minimizing the chances of courtship procedures ever taking place.

Pot fights the spread of communism by wrapping people up in themselves instead of ideologies, it fights starvation by inducing people to buy more food, and it slows nuclear proliferation by dulling the minds of would-be physicists. It's even good for your health. It makes you cough. How else would you get all that black phlegm out of your lungs in the morning?

'OH, OH! GUESS WHO JUST RECEIVED THEIR DRAFT REGISTRATION NOTICES...'

STEVE KLEIN

Your Voice

Oftimes, students, including Collegian editors, may lose sight of attitudes which pervade the general student population. As students, we form our community of friends and translate those opinions into a broader, sometimes false consensus.

In addition, it is often a minority of individuals who create an imbalanced percentage of the news. This is the case in newspapers, be they large or small.

This column will provide the space for students to speak what's on their minds.

This week, I was specifically concerned with the reinstitution of the draft and the role both men and women should serve. As I opened the student directory and randomly chose names, the following opinions were voiced by those question on this issue.

Alan Levine, a 21-year-old resident of Thatcher said: "I'm glad to see the crossword is back in there (Collegian). I heard a lot of people talking about that today." He added, "I'd go and fight if something came about—we must defend the President—we're all a part of it." Alan said women should not have to fight.

"Women should register, women should fight," said Beth Bjork, an 18-year-old freshman from Thoreau Dormitory. She said "I don't want to, however."

Allison Lee, a freshman residing in Crabtree dormitory believes the draft is justified. "I feel the Soviet Union is a threat to this country," she said. Amidst protests heard over the phone from her next door neighbor, Allison, 18, believes women should be drafted, although she said, "It's a hard question to answer."

"As a rule," she said, "my friends are not for the draft, particularly for women."

Dave Ash, a 19-year-old freshman from James Dormitory, summed the whole situation up and said, "Everyone's getting bent out of shape." He said the Soviet Union is not a physical threat to this country. "I would fight as a last possible option," he said. When asked if his friends would fight, he said, "Sure they'd fight."

Residing in Coolidge Dormitory, Janet Shanley justified the draft along a somewhat different line. She said the volunteer service is not working out and is functioning poorly. Reinforcing her point, she said, "The army is largely made up of high school drop-outs." The draft: "It's O.K.," she said. According to the Equal Rights Amendment's principles, Janet, 19, had no doubt women should fight.

Andy Donald said he comes from a military background and is presently in the Air Force. His basic point was that this country must be prepared ahead of time. Andy, 19, said, "We have to get everything together. Why not?" He believes his friends feel the same way. He said the Collegian is doing a "pretty good job" covering the issue. However, he said the Collegian tends to be biased.

"I haven't thought about registration, however, if there was a war I would go and fight," Dave Rosa said. Dave, who lives in Brett Dormitory said the recent Soviet invasion of Afghanistan does not justify the move. Concerning women: "I feel it's a women's perogative if she wants to fight as a service to her country," he said. "They shouldn't be forced to."

Preserving constitutional freedom

DEBBIE WALLACE

A variety of restrictive abortion legislation has made it difficult for women to exercise their constitutional right to decide with their physicians whether or not to terminate a women. After passage, the figure dropped to a few thousand a year.

However, Judge John Dooling Jr. ruled this law unconstitutional in a 642 page decision. The judge argued that medically necessary abortions cover a wider ground than the life endangerment test laid down by the Hyde amendment.

The amendment's most severe form, which went into effect last November denies abortion to poor women. In 1976, federal officials say, Medicaid funds helped pay for as many as 300,000 abortions a year on poor women. After passage, the figure dropped to a few thousand a year.

The judge's ruling rightly found that impact grossly unacceptable. He wrote that "a woman's conscientious decision, in consultation with her physician, to terminate her pregnancy because that is medically necessary to her health" was an exercise of the "most fundamental of rights." He added that the irreconcilable conflict of deeply and widely held views on this issue of individual conscience excludes any legislative intervention." Thus he nullified the Hyde amendment, giving its backers 30 days to appeal. They immediately did so, directly to the Supreme Court, which had returned the case to Dooling for judgment in the first place.

If a woman decides with her physician an abortion is necessary it is her right to terminate the pregnancy. To allow this right for rich women but not for poor women reputiates everything the Medicaid program is supposed to stand for. Not only have poor women cut down the number of abortions because of the Hyde amendment but many have sold their food stamps and furniture, refrained from properly feeding themselves and their families, or turned to prostitution in order to afford a needed abortion. Other women have been driven into the hands of back-alley abortionists because a restriction in legal abortion does not stop women's need for abortion. History proves that women have sought abortions for centuries and were able to manage this one way or another through doctor or hanger. Judge Dooling's decision needs to be supported by all women and men who agree that women have a right to choose. By giving others the right to chose what is right for them you are not condoning the practice but merely allowing them the constitutional freedom they were justly awarded January 22, 1973. It's about time both poor and rich women were allowed to exercise this right.

Letters

Respect for life, not for the draft

To UMass Women 18 to 26:

If the men in the Senate and the Pentagon and on Wall St. want a war, may I suggest that they, personally, go and fight it. I, on the other hand, do not intend to kill or be killed in a war of their fabrication.

Women in this country and most of this world have little political, social or financial power. We do not make the political decisions that control embargo or military spending or war. Most of those who die in wars are not the few powerful men who declare them.

Now Mr. Carter tells the young women of this country we may be drafted into his fight. In this culture, to respect life is a political act. I conceive and commit a political act when I say, we must and we will resist the draft.

In this country there are many, many women and, I hope, many men who will not kill for Mr. Carter or anyone else. We must feel and we must make clear to the few men who control most of this world that the most powerful human strength is a respect, a reverence and a love for the lives of all beings. We must know that we can live in peace and that we have the right not to die in any man's war.

In Peace,
Rachael Stark '81

Marianne Faithfull — serious contender as artist

By JIM MORAN
Fine Arts Editor

Marianne Faithfull
Broken English (Island)

With the release of Broken English, Marianne Faithfull has entered herself in the race for serious contention as a musical artist. Of course, one could point to her self-titled album made in 1965 as the "official" start of her music career. But that's stretching it a bit, since she's only released a few unsuccessful albums since. In fact, her only real "claims to fame" were a cover of the Rolling Stones' As Tears Go By, (released in '65) and the highly-disputed Sister Morphine (released in '69). The Stones claim they wrote the latter song, but Faithfull says she wrote it. Suffice it to say that they "'collaborated."

Back in the 60's, Faithfull's voice was soft and feminine, her style sentimental bordering on the tearjerky. Yup, she could've opted for Karen Carpenter status. But thank God she's chosen Nico instead.

As Mick Jagger's girlfriend in the mid-60's, Faithfull (then only Faithful) was a British sophisticat. With her Carnaby Street fashions, blonde hair and black mascara, Faithfull epitomized what the dashing male rockers were looking for in a "mod" woman. Unfortunately for Marianne, her talents never developed much more beyond that physical entity. But it now appears that those earlier years have served her well. Indeed, they seem to have been the breeding-ground for her newly-released material.

Review

Faithfull, the daughter of an English baroness, is well-travelled. Thus the title cut on side one reflects an understanding of the problems of a foreigner, a traveller. With the disco-infused patterns weaving in and out between the words, Faithfull slurs, "Don't say it in Russian, /don't say it in "happy family," a "circle" of loneliness, "Witches Song" defines ambiguity. It could be about anything from a lesbian encounter group to a cultist ritual. Indeed, Faithfull could start her own cult.

Side two opens with the melancholy "Ballad of Lucy Jordan," which may be an autobiography, of sorts, though Shel Silverstein wrote it. One cannot forget that Faithfull went through a dismal 15 years, beginning German/Say it in bro-o-o-o-ken English." Absolutely effective. And as if that wasn't enough, Faithfull repeats the question throughout: "What are you fighting for?" A tremendous social comment.

The next song on this side, "Witches Song" is certainly one of the two prettiest songs on the album. With its ghostly background vocals, and its melodic tone, coupled with the references to a bond—a men thought of feminists, ten out of 25 admitted that their idea of a feminist fit this image. Several men described feminists as being "women's liberators." Brendan Nelson, a political science major, said, "A feminist is a woman who knows her rights and isn't afraid to tell you."

When asked if men felt intimidated by feminists, the majority said "yes" because they bring out men's insecurities. "Society said that women should be passive and let the men dominate. Now, all of a sudden, women are free to do anything. I think that's good, but it scared a lot of men. It's a new type of competition," said sophomore Richard Green.

Mark Porters, a graduate student, gave an entirely different view of feminism when he said, "No, I don't feel intimidated by feminists. I am a feminist. I think women should have the same rights as men. After all, isn't that what feminism is?"

with her romance with Jagger at age 17, and continuing through periods of: a flawed acting career, a miscarriage by Jagger, raising a child by husband John Dunbar, kicking a bad smack habit begun through her association with Keith Richard's common law wife, Anita Palenberg, and finally, a suicide attempt at the turn of the 60's.

This sordid life is depicted in the character of one Lucy Jordan, an upper-middle class housewife who takes her own life. Nowhere is the benefit of hindsight better demonstrated as with lyrics like these: "At the age of 37/she realized she'd never been/To Paris in a sports car/with the warm wind in her hair." Ah-h, the stuff of which tragedies are made.

Faithfull closes the album with two great numbers; a cover of John Lennon's "Working Class Heroes," and a tasteful little ditty called "Why'd Ya Do It?" Faithfull's version of the Lennon-authored piece is a tribute to the ex-Beatle. The more developed, shocking, electric vibrations of the guitar, and the pain with which Faithfull delivers the tune are incredible. The echo effects on the song, worked into the line "When your young they fill your mind with thoughts of sex and TV," is noteworthy. And, of course, the refrain: "A woring class hero is something to be."

"Why'd Ya Do It?," from its dynamic guitar riff-opening to its repetitious end, may be the most blatant yet powerful display of vulgarity ever to grace the lyrics of a song. One supposes that is why the BBC saw fit to ban it. But don't let the surface effect of the language prevent you from appreciating the force and meaning with which Faithfull renders it. There's some spectacular imagery in lines like: "You tied me to the mast of the ship of fools," and "You drove my ego to a really bad skid."

The other songs on the album deserve a mention: "Brain Drain," a song with a title well-suited to the new wave genre of anatomical deterioration. Also good are "Guilt," by Barry Reynolds, and "What's the Hurry?," though the latter seems geared toward the "Heart of Glass" syndrome. It's a bit oversynthesized.

Faithfull had the assitance of several studio musicians on this one, including Steve Winwood on keyboards and late of Traffic, and Terry York, among others.

For the girl who may have been the impetus behind such Stones' classics as "You Can't Always Get What You Want," "Stupid Girl," and "Sister Morphine," this marks quite a maturation. In the tradition of Grace Slick, Nico, Patti Smith, and Lene Lovich—welcome Marianne Faithfull.

What more can I say—I can't buy the record for you.

ACCESS

. . . to management training for commercial lending officers

ON-CAMPUS INTERVIEWS TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 5

At Shawmut Bank of Boston, N.A., there is one word which sums up our philosophy toward our MBA's and toward the Corporation as a whole. That word is access. Which to us means the ability to approach and communicate. The freedom to utilize resources. And the encouragement to actively participate, to gain insight, and ultimately, realize personal and professional goals.

Designed to provide each participant with a comprehensive range of experiences tailored to meet his/her capabilities and special interests, our program is thorough. Our program is tough. And our program is successful. Very successful.

Throughout the 18-month training period . . . through in-house and external seminars, you will be sharpening your analytical, financial and marketing skills in preparation for the role of Commercial Lending Officer. You will be assigned to different lending groups in order to acquire specialized expertise in a variety of areas. You will be encouraged to call on clients with officers. And you will be exposed to all technical aspects of lending, including legal documentation.

Because we believe in the importance of knowing where you fit in the overall picture . . . and because it is important for you to decide for yourself where you would best be suited, rotation throughout the various Shawmut divisions is an integral part of our program. This training will familiarize you with the products and services available to customers of the Bank . . . which means that you will be better qualified to meet the needs of our customers, in whatever field you specialize.

If you believe we've outlined a program that you can fit into, we believe we ought to talk.

A thorough knowledge of accounting and finance is expected as well as effective blend of organizational ability and interpersonal skills.

HOW TO GAIN ACCESS:

Come see us Tuesday, February 5.
And if you can't make it then, send your resume directly to: Management Recruitment Program, Shawmut Bank of Boston, N.A., One Federal Street, Boston, MA 02211 ti draft activists.

The "characters have changed but war is still brought to you by the same people — the military," said Dannenfelser, a veteran of the 1960s anti-war movement. "The military trains you and teaches you to kill and be violent. I'm completely opposed to this thing."

Counter-demonstrators turned out in some areas, but there were no violent confrontations.

"I'm definitely pro-peace. But I'm pro-draft registration. If the United States had a crisis today, what would we do?" said Dave Adelson at the Columbia rally. "I'm afraid for the rest of the world and for my country," said an unidentified woman at the Brown meeting. "You can't ignore what's happening."

In Iowa, rallies that organizers said would be held each Wednesday drew a total of about 500 people to campuses in Des Moines, Ames and Iowa City. "I think we all know registration is the first step toward the draft. Once they get that information, you can be sure they're going to use it," Steve Brown of the Iowa Civil Liberties Union told about 150 students at the Drake University campus in Des Moines.

O'Neil: Draft of women unlikely

By JIM ADAMS
Associated Press

WASHINGTON (AP) — House Speaker Thomas P. O'Neill said yesterday he told the White House that any proposal to register women for a possible draft would be "anathema" in Congress.

"I don't think the registration of women will go," O'Neill told reporters.

Asked if he gave that advice directly to President Carter, O'Neill replied, "You can be assured the president knows my opinion."

Carter has until Feb. 9 to recommend whether women should register.

Secretary of Defense Harold Brown came out this week in favor of registering women — but said he would not draft them for combat — and Rosalynn Carter has said she favors registering women.

Carter's full recommendations on the draft and draft registration are required by Feb. 9 under a law passed by Congress last year after the House defeated a proposal to renew draft registration.

Brown told the House Armed Services Committee Tuesday that women should be included "largely (as) a matter of equity and social policy.

"I certainly don't believe they should be in combat," Brown said.

He said women as well as men should be registered because if Congress renewed the draft during some crisis it might also have to decide whether to draft women for noncombat jobs.

In a related development, Marine Corps Commandant Robert H. Barrow told the House Armed Services Committee Thursday "the all-volunteer force is in trouble."

The comment drew unusual applause from a number of committee members who oppose the all-volunteer force and favor returning to some form of military draft.

But Barrow said later in an interview, "I said it's in trouble; I didn't say it isn't working...It may be possible to fix it; it may not."

Carter asked for draft registration in case the draft is needed in some crisis, but some members of Congress say a peacetime draft is also needed because the all-volunteer force can't get the manpower the services need.

Barrow told the committee "you have a quality Marine Corps in spite of the all-volunteer force, not because of it."

"Recruiters are working increasingly in the lower socioeconomic levels of our society," Barrow said. "This is not to say they don't make good Marines. But their trainability for more difficult jobs is questionable."

Barrow said in the interview that the number of technical jobs in the Marine Corps is steadily rising while the number of recruits able to do such jobs is decreasing.

He said also that "there is a reduced propensity to serve (in the military services) — we don't know the reason for it."

"I'm not saying we have to rush to the draft or throw money at the problem to solve it," Barrow said. "I don't know what the answer is."

Varied workshops set for Women's Week

By ANNE MERCIER
Collegian Staff

Negotiations are being made to "hopefully" bring Lolita LeBron, a Puerto Rican Nationalist imprisoned for years, to UMass as the main speaker to kick-off International Women's Week March 2, Jamila Gaston of Everywoman's Center announced at the International Women's Week organizational meeting Wednesday night.

The theme of International Women's Week scheduled for March 2 through March 8 at UMass will be "women, family, and work," said Susan Markman who co-chaired the meeting with Suman Bohm and Ellie Bagli.

Despite "limited time, limited funds, and limited energy," this year's International Women's Week will offer many workshops, lectures, and panels which will "relate to the theme in a strong way," Markman said.

Proposed worksops include "Health Issues," with discussions on reproductive rights, the impact of Planned Parnethood on Third World women, hypertension, stress, anger, and assertiveness training, and alcoholism; "Violence In The Home," with discussions on child abuse, battered women, rape, and support groups; "Women Hold Up Half the Sky," featuring skills workshops including WESCO organizing, media skills, Equal Rights Mendment/legal rights, socialist feminism, and lesbian feminism; and "International Women," with discussions on the role of women in South African liberation struggles, Puerto Rican families in the U.S., folklore of Jewish women, Southeast Asian women, Asian-American women and Carribean women.

There will also be a Resource Fair, which would provide space for groups to set up tables and informally announce to people the services that are available in the community.

The performing Arts and Music Committee, Bohm said, is also considering a list of 12 or 13 singers who may be able to perform during the week.

Minutemen try again at Colonial Classic

By DAVE BRADLEY
Collegian Staff

How much would you snicker at the thought of the men's basketball team winning even ONE game in this weekends Colonial Classic at the Boston Garden?

Some people, oppositon coaches included, don't think it's all that impossible.

"The kids are gonna take it," said a sincere UMass assistant coach, Ray Ricketts. "Any game we've gone into I've though we had a chance to win."

Are these the words of a coach whose emotional stability has fallen victim to The Streak - 28 losses in a row? Not at all. Ricketts feels the team has been competitive in the majority of this season's contests, with victory only a few turnovers and foul shots away.

Saturday's loss to the University of Rhode Island is a good example. UMass had a seven-point lead at halftime on 52 percent shooting from the field, and were only down by two with two minutes left to play. But two UMass turnovers and a few URI foul shots in the closing minutes gave the Minutemen their 15th loss of the season, 64-59.

Boston College coach Tom Davis said he wasn't ruling UMass out.

"I've heard some people say they're not as bad as their record might indicate," he said, "and they're improving. I certainly think it's a good tournament and a good field."

Harvard coach Frank McGlaughlin feels UMass has the potential to win the Classic.

"I think the teams are well balanced. Talentwise, anything can happen," he said. "It's a great opportunity for them. If they win in the classic, the rest of the season is forgotten."

Coach Ricketts couldn't agree more with the Harvard mentor. A single win, Ricketts feels, would give the Minutement the confidence they need to turn the season around.

"I think it would be a second season," the coach said. "It's not like we're saying this season's over because it's not."

UMass will play Holy Cross Friday at 9:00 p.m. (ch. 27) with B.C. facing Harvard at 7:00 p.m. The winners and losers will play each other the following night at 9 and 7 respectively.

The Cross (12-6) is coming off a 101-69 victory Wednesday over Dartmouth College in which New England's all time division leading scorer, Ron Perry, scored 24 points, exceeding his average of 22.7.

Hoopwomen conquer number one Friars

By MIKE ESTRADA
Collegian Staff

PROVIDENCE—The women's basketball team may have regained the supremacy of New England that they enjoyed for most of the season as the Minutewomen defeated number one ranked Providence College here last night 67-61.

"It's a good win any time you can win away," said Minutewomen coach Mary Ozdarski.

Julie Ready led UMass scorers with 21 points while Sue Peters hit for 20.

The Minutewomen went on top early but the Friars remained close throughout the game. UMass' biggest lead was six, late in the first half, 27-21, when Julie Ready hit six unanswered points.

At the beginning of the second half Val DePaolo (8 points), Peters, and Ginger Legare (11 points) hit consecutive baskets to up the Minutewomen lead to 35-25. However, Lynn Sheedy, high scorer on the night with 25, drove back to get the Friars within reach. Providence's Rita Fraser hit to cut the UMass lead to two.

A series of technical fouls called on assistant coach Steve Jefferson made it 54-52 and then Sheedy tied it at 56 with 4:30 remaining in the game. Peters then went to work and quickly upped the Minutewomen lead to five.

The Minutewomen, who have now won four in a row, take on Bishop's University Sunday afternoon at 2:00 at the Curry Hicks Cage.

Women win

By LAURA FRANK
Collegian Staff

The Boston College womans swim team came to UMass confident of victory. However, the UMass team was determined not to let them have what they wanted. They went on th beat B.C. 74-66.

B.C. came out strong in the first half of the meet but they could not overcome a very powerful UMass squad. B.C. won the medley relay. Leslie Johnson placed second in the 500 freestyle, with Caroline Benjamin finishing third. Jennifer Black and Nancee Shifflett went on to a one-three finish in the 200 yd. individual medley. Black set new pool and UMass records with a time of 2:19.0, which qualifies her for the National Championships.

Judy Miller had a spectacular day, swimming to a first place finish in the 100 and 50 freestyle events, and finishing second in the 200yd freestyle. Sue Flynn finished third in the 50 freestyle. The combination of Jennifer Black and Gail Holland were able to give UMass a one-three finish in the 100 backstroke, and Theresa Totin captured first place finishes in the 100yd individual medley, 50 breastroke, and second in the 100 breastroke. Sue Flynn and Gail Holland captured second and third place in the 50 backstroke, while Leslie Johnson swam a very fast 1:03.6, to give UMass yet another first place finish.

Men at URI

By SCOTT SOLOMON
Collegian Staff

The UMass men's swim team will be looking for victory number two tomorrow afternoon, as they travel to Rhode Island to face the Rams at 1:00 p.m.

The minutemen will be relying on the strength of distance men Mike Boucher and Bob DeConick, who both have had productive training sessions.

"They (URI) are a little stronger than us," said Coach Russ Yarworth. "But we may be able to surprise them."

One UMass swimmer who did not participate in training over intersession was Jib Bowers, who went back to Hawaii over the five week break. Nonetheless, Bowers will be called upon for some of strong swimming tomorrow afternoon.

In addition, the Minutemen hope to capture both the one and three-meter diving events, with solid performances from Dan Anthony and Mark Vernaglia.

Trackmen to Princeton

By JANE WOLFSON
Collegian Staff

This Sunday afternoon selected competitors from the UMass indoor track team will travel to Princeton, N.J. to compete in the annual Princeton Relays.

The Minutemen will be taking the mile relay team along with the distance medley relay.

Running in the distance medley will be sophomore Paul Beaulieu the mile leg, senior Rick Walls at the 880 leg, senior tri-captain Steve MacDougall running the half mile, and who will run the quarter mile leg is undecided.

Running the mile relay will be senior tri-captain Mickey Baugh, junior tri-captain Rick Trunfio, junior Bob Pearson, and either junior Rick Cady or junior Paul King.

"The competition will be excellent," said MacDougall. "I think we have a good shot of qualifying for the Nationals in the distance medlay, if everyone can run their best times."

"Whoever runs the fastest quarter mile split in the mile relay will probably run the distance medley," said UMass coach Ken O'Brien."

9:50 is the time needed to qualify.

The Minutemen's next meet will be next weekend when they travel to Orono, Maine to take on the Black Bears of UMaine.

Matmen take on Rams

By DONNA SULLIVAN

Saturday the matmen will travel to the University of Rhode Island to face a tough URI wrestling squad. The Rams have a six and four record and placed fourth as a team in the Northeastern Open Tournament.

Heavyweight John Allen will be looking to keep an undefeated season going against a Ram opponent who boasts a 13-5 record.

URI boasts two tournament champions in the 142 and 167 pound classes. UMass goes armed with a 9-3 record and one wrestler who has placed in every tournament entered. 118 pound Rich Schiarizzi has placed fourth in the three tourneys this season and has an 8-4 record.

UMass also looks strong in the 150 pound class with Kevin Murphy who holds a 9-1 record. Murphy placed first in the Coast Guard Tourney held last semester. Murphy shouldn't have much trouble against an opponent with a 2-8 record.

The Rams have defeated Syracuse, Connecticut, Yale, Lock Haven, Montclair and New Hampshire.

Big win breaks Minutemen's losing streak

By KIRK LEWIS
Special to the Collegian

It was a long time in coming. The UMass basketball squad had begun living on the memories of past victories, mired in a slump of 29 consecutive losses labeled as "The Streak." But over the weekend, the Minutemen stormed back from an opening night loss to the Crusaders of Holy Cross (84—73), to crush the Crimson of Harvard in the consolation game of the Colonial Classic 67—44, giving first—year head coach Ray Wilson his initial win in the collegiate ranks.

The streak started in last year's Colonial Classic, when the Minutemen dropped an 82—70 decision to this years' Classic champions; Boston College. And it ended Saturday night as Ty Nedd swished a free throw with :04 left on the Garden clock amid cheers from hundreds of fans and the host of players gathered around Wilson.

It all seemed to come too easy for the Munutemen. Twenty seconds into the game freshman Danny Wright (game high with 18), hit his patented 10—foot jump shot, giving Umass the lead 2—0. After a backdoor layup by Harvard tied the contest at 2—2, the floodgates burst for the Crimson.

A twisting layup by junior—guard Tom Witkos, a backdoor feed in to Wright, and two twenty—footers by Curtis Phauls sandwiched around another Wright jumper, shot the Minutemen into a 12—2 lead.

Heading into the locker room, UMass had its biggest halftime lead of the season, 35—25 and visions of that elusive first win lingered on the minds of many.

Curtis Phauls, who played superbly in both contests, scoring 40 points and being named to the All—Tourney team, banged in a sparkling layup at 19:40 of the second half, and the Minutemen were off and running again.

After a Bob Allen shot narrowed the margin back down to 12, Dan Wright hit two more jumpers, and Billy Morrison gunned one in from downtown finishing off a 10—2 spurt which buried the Crimson at 45—27.

What didn't happen at this point was the key to the game. "The one thing we haven't had all season," Wilson explained, "is a confident attitude throughout the game. We usually fall into a five minute gap where nothing goes right. But tonight, it all worked out."

"The important thing," he pointed out," is that we are now playing as a team. I can honestly say that this was the first game where everything meshed and the team played soled as a unit.

The man who may have enjoyed the win more than anyone else was Wilson, who patiently sat and watched his team lose gave after game. "It's a real relief getting that first one under the belt," he said. "Not that it's going to improve our record that much, but with the confidence it instilled in the kids, and knowing we will make the playoffs at the end of the year, every game from now on will be a test.

"The one thing I can say proudly about this team, is that they are not quitters.

Spanish cuts affect 600; lack of money cited

By MICHAEL SILVA
Collegian Staff

Spanish Department Chair Martha Francescato announced Friday that about ten sections of Spanish had been cancelled due to lack of funds, a decision affecting almost 600 students.

The announcement came during a meeting with Acting Associate Provost Robert Sleight Jr., Francescato and a group of 17 students, who said they are frustrated by what sophomore Nelson McGroarty called "a lack of consideration for the students on the part of the administration."

Promising students "I guarantee I'll look into this," Sleigh said at one point during the meeting: "This is not a case of spectacular management."

"This is the first time I have heard anything about it (the cancellations) or I would have looked into it earlier" Sleigh added.

The meeting developed after two sections of Spanish 120 met with Francescato when their instructors failed to show for class.

"We came to class Wednesday and Friday and neither time did a teacher show up," said Terry Monac, a would-be Spanish student. "We want to know why we weren't told of this earlier. Students were being registered for these classes as late as Monday. This should have been dealt with before we registered."

Monac also said she called the French and Spanish departments on Friday afternoon and found that 15 Spanish sections and three French sections were cancelled. Monac said two 110 sections, six 120 sections, one 126 section and four 140 sections of Spanish were cancelled.

The classes, Franescato said, were dropped for lack of funding to pay teacher's assistants salaries. "We need money for TA's. I offered to have money taken out of my pay to help them, but my hands are tied."

Sleigh estimated that an additional $15,000 would be needed to pay teacher's assistants salaries this semester.

"We spend only what the state gives us," said Richard W. Noland of the College of Arts and Sciences Deans' Office. "We had hoped to get more funds but none were available." Noland urged students to "write to their congressmen" to petition the state for more funds.

In light of the cancellations, several students affected questioned the University language requirement and their future here at UMass.

"I couldn't get into Spanish 120 last semester," said Scott Hartman, a second semester junior. "I need this course to graduate and planned my schedule around it."

"Why does the University have the requirement if it can't fund the courses?" replied Francescato when asked if the cancellations would affect the requirement. "We cannot fulfill our moral obligation to give students sufficient courses."

Expressing frustration over the lack of funding, Associate Professor Rosalie Soons and Coordinator of first year Spanish courses, Maria Esformes, agreed that there is a need for foreign language studies but that money is unavailable.

At the Friday meeting, Sleigh agreed to meet with all interested students to discuss what has been done concerning the cancellations.

The meeting will be today at 12:20 p.m. in Whitmore 374.

Controversy rages over possibility of women's draft registration

By DEBBIE WALLACE
Collegian Staff

President Carter intends to turn over his plans for reinstating the draft registration to the Congress Feb. 9, and women should then find out if they will be asked to register for military service. According to the New York Times, this is not the first time military servce for women has been seriously considered. At the end of World War II, Congress considered a measure which would enact the draft for single, unemployed women.

Seymur

Congressional action wold be required in order for women to be eligible for the draft, as the President only has the authority to call for a registration of men.

Some reactions to women being included in the draft registry strongly include the stipulation that the Equal Rights Amendment (ERA) first be passed. The impending draft registration for women has brought ERA into the limelight.

Many UMass students interviewed said if women really want equal rights they have to extend it to military battle. Yet, other students questioned what benefit the ERA will have, students said ERA and women's

Rally responds to plans for draft

By MICHAEL SUSSMAN

Nearly 600 people braved the cold and wind Saturday on the Amherst common to register their protest against Preisident Carter's draft and registration propsals.

The rally followed a march by about 400 of the demonstraters from the Campus Center Pond to the common.

The rally and march, both sponsored by the Five—College Anti—Draft Coalition, remained peaceful, although spirited.

The Five—College Anti—Draft Coalition is a loosely organized group which appears to encompass a variety of political viewpoints. Tom Stoner, a Hampshire College student and member of a local research and lobby group called Hampshire Coalition for Peace through Disarmament, said, "I want to make it clear that no—one in the group can act as spokesperson for all of us."

The 1 p.m. rally included speakers and singers whose main theme was resistance to both the draft and registration proposals.

Draft reactions vary in region

By MICHAEL SUSSMAN

Reactions to President Carter's draft and registration proposals range from strong opposition to full support among the members of the Five-College community.

During a rally against the draft Saturday on the Amherst Common, a large banner could be seen hanging from a window of the Delta Upsilon fraternity at Amherst College. The banner read "The U.S.A.—It's worth the fight."

Bruce Dirks, a 21-year-old Amherst College economics major, was one of a group of about a dozen students standing in front of the fraternity watching the rally. "I support registration because I think we much increase our ability to respond to the challenges of aggression in the world without nuclear weapons," he said. "We have to be able to use the tactical option."

Dirks said he believes the student population at Amherst College is evenly divided on the issue. "There seems to be no middle ground," he added.

Death count reaches 20 at prison

New Mexico riot ends

By PAUL STEVENS
Associated Press

SANTA FE, N.M.—National Guardsmen and a police SWAT team recaptured the burning New Mexico State Prison yesterday to free all the remaining hostages and end a 36-hour bloodbath that left at least 20 inmates dead and 50 persons hospitalized.

Gov. Bruce King, who said he agreed with the plan to send in the troops despite threats that the hostages would be killed, told reporters the number of dead inmates had reached 20 "and may go higher." One of the prisoners was beheaded.

Without firing a shot, about 100 Guardsmen and policemen entered the grounds at 1:45 p.m. Mountain Standard Time. When a group of about 25 defiant inmates holed up the administration building began shouting at the officers, the Guardsmen fixed their bayonets.

"Shoot us," one of the convicts yelled. "We've got no guns,"

A short time later, Corrections Commission Chairman Bud Richards announced, "We're in control right now. Not a shot has been fired."

Corrections officers said the last three of the 15 prison employees originally taken hostage were found safe. Two guards were found in a gas chamber which is no longer used and a medical technician was found hiding in a vault.

"We are totally under control and we have all the hostages," King said. "We are saddened by the number of prisoners that we did lose—some to smoke and to other things."

The governor said the death count may go a little higher, but "not to any of the numbers we have heard."

State Sen. Manny Aragon of Albuquerque, who met with prisoners during the negotiations, said that based on what the inmates told him, the death toll could go to 75 or more. "I wouldn't doubt it," he replied when asked if that were possible.

Poll reveals high support for Carter's threat of 'military force'

By EVANS WITT
Associated Press

NEW YORK—Americans say they are willing to send U.S. troops to the Persian Gulf if the Soviets invade that region, the Associated Press NBC News poll shows.

Thus, the public supports the thrust of the so-called "Carter Doctrine" put forward by President Carter in his State of the Union Message in late January:

"Let our position be absolutely clear.

"An attempt by any outside force to gain control of the Persian Gulf will be regarded as an assault on the vital interests of the United States of America and such an assault will be repelled by any means necessary, including military force."

In fact, the poll found Americans almost as willing to use U.S. military power to defend the Persian Gulf as they they are to defend Wesern Europe.

Sixty-four percent of those questioned Tuesday and Wednesday said they favor sending troops "if the Soviets invade the Persian Gulf, where most of our imported oil comes from."

Twenty-six percent said they oppose such a use of U.S. troops and 10 percent of the 1,600 adults interviewed nationwide by telephone were not sure.

Only a slightly larger percentage — 67 percent — favored U.S. troops' fighting off a Soviet attack on Western Europe. U.S. defense of Western Europe has, been a cornerstone of American policy for decades.

Twenty-two percent oppose fighting for Western Europe and 11 percent were not sure.

This finding is an increase from that of a Gallup Poll in late 1978, when 54 percent said they would back U.S. troops fighting for Western Europe.

Faced with the turbulent world situation, Americans express a definite willingness to use U.S. military power to counter Soviet threats, wherever they may occur.

For example, despite the Iranians' holding of American hostages in Tehran, a surprising 45 percent of the public is willing to send U.S. troops to fight in Iran if the U.S.S.R. invades that country. Forty percent oppose sending U.S. troops to Iran — roughly equal to those supporting the use of troops because of the sample error of this poll. Fifteen percent were undecided.

In line with this willingness to use military force is another rise in support for increased defense spending — to yet another high for the decade.

U.S. internal security debated

WASHINGTON (AP) — The Carter administration intends to propose that a new, secret court be given power to authorize covert government intelligence agents to break into the homes and offices and open the mail of certain Americans.

But with President Carter's proposal still at least five days from being made public, debate already has begun over just which Americans should be targets of such intrusions.

The question is whether the government can act against any American believed to be an agent of a foreign power or only against Americans suspected of criminal activity. Another question is just how certain of that criminal activity the government must be.

Pakistan aid 'only a beginning'

ISLAMABAD, Pakistan (AP) — U.S. national security adviser Zbigniew Brzezinski said yesterday the proposed $400 million in U.S. economic and military aid to Pakistan is "only the beginning of the United States response to the threat posed" by Soviet troops in Afghanistan.

"The United States is committed to safeguarding Pakistan in terms of the 1959 (mutual security) agreement against the (Soviet) danger from the north," he said.

After two days of talks here with Pakistan President Zia ulHaq, Brzezinski told reporters "Pakistan faces a serious threat" from the Soviet presence in neighboring Afghanistan.

Hartford Civic Center to reopen

SPRINGFIELD (AP) — Hartford, Conn., Mayor George Athanson said yesterday he was "99 percent sure" the Hartford Civic Center coliseum would reopen Wednesday.

The coliseum has been closed since its roof collapsed Jan. 18, 1978.

The $31.5 million reconstruction began shortly after the huge coliseum roof groaned and collapsed into the arena seats under the weight of snow and ice, eight hours after a UMass vs. UConn basketball game.

Athanson said Hartford had been granted a temporary occupancy permit allowing officials to reopen the facility Feb.6.

liberation were sought by women but wouldn't change discriminatory practices.

Jay Burnett, a junior Fisheries Biology major said, "Women are too nice to get killed, but they should be drafted because it fits with ERA." He said he has spent a lot of time worrying about the draft, but feels the volunteer army is not sufficient. "We have an obligation," he said. Art History sophomore Cindy Weill agreed, "The draft is necessary." She said, "I'm for registering for the draft and if ERA is passed I think women could be drafted."

'The draft is necessary...I'm for registering for the draft and if ERA is passed I think women could be drafted.'

Assistant History Professor Joyce Berkman said women being drafted might boost female anti-ERA forces. She said, "On principle I'm opposed to the draft, but serious implications will occur if women are not included in the draft. This will justify male roles that their job is to protect women."

Nunes

Women's Studies Department Staff Assistant, Dale Melcher said, "If they are not going to give me my equal rights I shouldn't have to register." Journalism junior, Steven Nunes said, "If they pass ERA, women should be drafted. Both things should happen, but they should go in the proper order." He added, "If ERA is passed, women should be involved in combat, and are physically capable of doing so."

Most students felt that women should be eligible for the draft, but opinions were mixerd as to whether or not women should be put into combat.

Berkman said, "If women are asked to register there will be a resentment from men who will not be as able to get desk jobs."

Mark Seymur, a senior Animal Science student who will be commissioned Second Lieutenant in May, said, "I think women would be just as qualified for combat, but there are enough male troops. For every person in combat there are eight support people needed for medical aid and other back-up. That's what women will be used for."

Heather Miner, senior Education major said, "It is a personal thing for women whether they want to go in and fight." Michael Martineau, sophomore Theater major said, "There is something too special about women for them to be in the trenches."

Berkman added that, assuming mothers and fathers are low priority in the draft, much like in the 60's, a rush into ill-considered marriages and child raising might occur. Women would most bear the burden of those hasty decisions, she said.

Charges reverse discrimination

Former professor sues UMass

By JOHN HARVEY
Collegian Staff

A former visiting assistant professor is suing the University on the grounds that he was a victim of "reverse discrimination" when a job in the School of Business Administration was awarded to a woman instead of him.

Hadie Bunn is seeking an injunction in U.S. District Court in Springfield that would bar UMass from filling a position in the general and business and finance department until his case is decided, as well as a court order requiring the department to hire him and give him a damage payment for loss of earning resulting from the alleged discrimination.

Bunn says Susan Grady, the woman who received the job as a business law professor, does not meet the minimal requirements for this position and he does. The minimal requirements are an undergraduate or graduate degree in business or Economics plus a Juris Doctorate degree. Bunn has a Bachelor of Science degree in accounting, Master of Business Administration degree and a Juris Doctorate degree. Grady has a Bachelor of Arts degree in English, a Master of Arts degree in Teaching and a Juris Doctorate degree.

Harold Hartzler, acting associate dean of the business school said in an Associated Press newsstory that he could have been discriminating against some white males when he recommended Grady for the job, but Bunn is not one of them. Hartzler said he recommended Grady in part because she had special experience in business and as a Massachusetts attorney, but he added that in some significant respect he wanted to hire Grady because she was a woman.

'In choosing Susan Grady, one of those other candiadates might have been discriminated against. I could have been discriminating against some white males'

"At the time I was doing the hiring I wasn't convinced she was the best candidate," Hartzler said. "There were a few other candidates that might have been better if I had followed them up. In choosing Susan Grady, one of those other candidates might have been discriminated against. I could have been discriminating against some white males." He added, "I'm confident, now that I've seen Grady's work, that I couldn't have done any better. She's an excellent faculty person."

Hartzler was quoted as saying he didn't recommend Bunn because he had demonstrated himself to be a poor teacher. Hartzler said he was confident Bunn would "never show strength, let alone excellence, in scholarship. There was no way that I was going to hire him."

Bunn said he has a letter of reference in which Hartzler describes Bunn as an outstanding teacher and scholar. Hartzler said he wrote the letter "to get rid of Bunn and to help him get a job someplace else."

Bunn told the Collegian Friday he has a memo from Hartzler saying the position was specifically reserved as an affirmative action position. Bunn now teachers at Quincy College, Quincy, Illinois.

Five-college radio to cut back foreign language program hours

By MARK FAGELSON
Collegian Staff

WFCR General Manager Robert Goldfarb Friday announced several programming changes that will affect mostly foreign language shows after March 31.

Many of the alterations involve the rescheduling and shortening of programs. Goldfarb, who came to the Five College Radio Station last November, wanted to "subject the whole program schedule to a close re-examination." His assessment was also influenced by the comments of listeners who responded by mail and phone at the station's request.

"Public radio has to interract with its listener more than TV and commercial radio," said Goldfarb. Because of this interraction, two of the station's programs, Que Tal Amigos and Tout en Francais, have had their hours shortened.

Que Tal suffers most under the proposed changes. Aired weeknights from 7:30 to 8:30, Saturday nights from 7 to 8, the show will be reduced to two hour-long programs scheduled at 11:00 p.m. on Tuesdays and Thursdays.

Que Tal is an all-Spanish show that not only serves the Spanish community, but students and professors as well. The program features news, music and cultural information for a segment of the public that has no other means of obtaining the information outside of WLBH, a Hartford-based commercial Spanish station.

The show's producer Sonia Vivas said changing the hours as Goldfarb has is the same as cancelling the show altogether. "For me, the show will not be on the air," she said. "The show should be active in the community but with its new time slot, many listeners will miss out," she added.

Most of the complaints written in to the station about Que Tal dealt more with the show's hours than its content, Goldfarb said. The show's format, however, will have to change to fit into its more restricted time slot, Vivas countered.

As a result of the proposed programming changes, two members of the WFCR staff resigned recently. Julio Torres, formerly the co-producer of Que Tal, resigned because of "instability" within the station. Jose Tolson, the producer of Bright Moments, a black classical music program, said he resigned because of the station's "implied racism."

Bright Moments is still being aired, but the future of Que Tal is in doubt. Vivas will be leaving in June, and Goldfarb's attempts at securing a replacement have thus far been unsuccessful.

Public radio "has to serve as an adjunct for education as one of its priorities," Goldfarb said.

In light of his statement, Vivas responded that Goldfarb's decision was "inhumane and irresponsible."

Anderson raps Carter 'war fever'

MIDDLEBURY, Vt. (AP)—The Carter administration is spreading "war fever," charges Republican presidential hopeful John Anderson.

Speaking to an overflow crowd at Middlebury College during the weekend, the Illinois representative said the world is in a time of danger, but "we ought to cool some of the war fever and we ought to cool some of the over-inflated rhetoric."

Anderson also said that politicians who promise cheap gasoline aren't telling the truth. He also spoke out against wage and price controls.

While in Vermont, Anderson picked up the official endorsement of Vermont Rep., James Jeffords.

Jeffords said he planned to campaign with Anderson prior to Vermont's March 4th primary.

Anderson is scheduled to speak here on Wednesday at 6:30 p.m. at Mahar Auditorium. His visit is being sponsored by the Undergraduate Political Science Association.

member of the Five-College Anti-Draft Coalition and the Hampshire Coalition for Peace through Disarmament, said he has met people who are "afraid of what's happening in Afghanistan. They feel the draft is something they might partake in." Stoner added, "I don't think they are in the majority."

Stoner said he is opposed to registration and the draft because, "I believe the preparations for war will make war." A confrontation with the Soviets would start with a limited nuclear war and escalate from there," he added. "There's nothing to keep us from a full-scale World War III.

UMass Legal Studies major John Rubin, also a member of the Anti-Draft Coalition, said he does see Russia as a threat. But he said he opposes the draft because "I think alternatives to violence must be found. I see America's power in the economic sector."

"I worked really hard for Jimmy Carter during his election campaign in Pennsylvania," Stoner said. "I feel he's really disappointed me."

A UMass graduate student, who asked that his name not be used, "It amazes me that Afghanistan is suddenly crucial to the national interst. The country has been in the Soviet sphere for years, and under direct Soviet control for over a year." He said he opposes the draft and registration, and had been involved in anti-war activities during the Vietnam era.

Other comments from various students who were involved or watching the demonstration Saturday ranged from, "If you think its cold now, wait until the Russians get to the Persian Gulf," to "Carter is using Afghanistan to try and show he's tough. It's a political machismo," and "I think drafting people is a form of involuntary servitude. The army should be volunteer.

Rate hike protest planned

By ROD SNELLING

Most citizens in Hamden, Franklin and Hampshire counties may be paying 25 percent more for their electricity by June 1 if Western Massachusetts Electric Co. is allowed its proposed rate hike. The Amherst chapter of the Student Coalition Against Nukes Nationwide and Alternative Energy Coalition, among other groups, plan to rally tomorrow at 7 p.m. at Springfield City Hall in an effort to halt the hike.

"People simply can't afford the increase," said Fran Schwartzberg, a SCANN representative. "It's the smaller, residential users who'll be burdened with the 25 percent hike, while industry will only suffer a 12 percent increase. What's more, with the ever-increasing cost of fuel, customers can figure realistically to be paying about 36 percent more for electric power."

WMECO applied to the Massachusetts Department of Public Utilities for the increase of some $28 million per year in November of 1979. The money is expected to go toward the construction costs of the Millstone 3 Power Plant in Connecticut.

A study by the Energy Systems Research Group Inc. show that WMECO's decision to invest in the Millstone project was based on unrealistic projections of increased public demand.

Buses will leave for the public hearings from UMass, Hampshire College, and Amherst center at 5:30 p.m.

"This is the first of the hearings, and the only one scheduled for this area where people are affected," Schwartzberg said. "It's essential that we get the other hearings held out here where the public concerned can be heard."

'American Buffalo' worth seeing

By EILEEN M. FOLEY
Collegian Staff

There is a problem inherent in college productions of plays like David Mamet's American Buffalo: the best make-up job in the world is not likely to convince viewers in an intimate theater, like the Fairweather at Amherst College, that the lanky, fresh-faced, orthodontally-faultless boy from Scarsdale is, in fact, a smoke-belching, fiftyish junkman with a mouth like the Chicago sewers.

This is not to say that the production which closed last night was utterly reprehensible; it was, in many respects, remarkably adept. Jay Beckner's direction made the most of a script virtually devoid of stage directions, and the production crew did a marvelous job of evoking the sleazy, rummage sale milieu of Don's Resale Shop, the setting of Mamet's two-act play.

But the acting in this three-character work provided both the greatest asset and the sole detriment to the production. Cameron Stracher's rendering of Bobby, the adolescent gopher at Don's Resale Shop, nicely preserved the tension between Bobby's loyalty to his Donny, his employer and mentor, and the demands of his heroin addiction. Stracher managed to do this without allowing the pathetic quality of the character to get out of hand; the kid is basically a drug-addled punk, not an urban martyr.

The part of Donny Dubrow, the crude, crusty owner of the junk-shop, and would-be fence, posed a greater problem for Michael Lennon. The problem is not that Lennon is an incompetent actor so much as that he was hopelessly miscast. This bare-faced student comes off as naive and trusting where he ought to be calloused and stupid. Lennon does reasonably well in the first act, puffing on a cigar, poking his screwdriver at the convoluted innards of an ailing toaster and mumbling "f--kin'-A." But the characterization develops bald spots in the second act, where the violence of the language escalates into physical violence.

Lennon tried hard, but then Carroll O'Connor wouldn't make it as Holden Caulfield, either.

Nicholas Schorr manages to escape this pitfall in his interpretation of Teach, Donny's friend and would-be accomplice in burglary. Mamet's script would tend to indicate that Teach is, like Donny, a man in his late forties, but Schorr portrays him as a younger man, say thirtyish, without doing violence to Mamet's intent. This Teach is a greasy, sleazy character with the trappings of machismo and the paranoia of a guy who thinks everyone else is as petty and cutthroat as he is.

Despite its flaws, it is unfortunate that the play only ran for one weekend. American Buffalo won David Mamet the Drama Critic's Circle Award for best American play in 1977, so the cost of the rights may have been prohibitive. It is however, an excellent play, and for that alone this production was well worth seeing.

Amherst College musical 'Purlie' presents dynamic performance

By MICHAEL MARTINEAU
Collegian Staff

Purlie makes you feel good. Perhaps it's because of its lively, passionate characters or its exhilirating gospel score, but whatever the reason, people left the Kirby Memorial Theater happier than they entered after seeing Amherst College's Department of Dramatic Arts' presentation.

Purlie is a musical adaptation of Ossie Davis' play Purlie Victorious, about a young, dynamic black minister who has a dream of preaching in his own church. A country church nearby which has been abandoned, Big Bethel, is the place that the preacher, Purlie Victorious Judson, has set his eye upon. Unfortunately, he needs five hundred dollars to purchase it.

He brings a girl home whom he has convinced to pose as a long lost relative, to claim her rightful inheritance from Ol' Capn'n Cotchipee, a rancher who owns most of the cotton and the slaves in the area. The Capn' took the money for himself when the rightful owner, one of his slaves, died. The planned masquerade does not quite come off. But, Purlie's dream does eventually come true, when the Cap'n's son turns on his bigot father, and gets them the deed for the church, and the money to buy it.

The plot moves quickly, and with only a few exceptions, this production does the show justice. The ensemble of singers and dancers are an energetic, musically tight group that is exciting to watch. Nancy Scattergood Jordan's choreography is inspired and inspiring, especially placed in front of Jim Moran's beautifully-designed scenery and Douglas D. Molas's lights.

The second act curtain raiser, "First Thing Monday Mornin'", is the most perfect blend of all these elements in the entire show. As the curtain goes up, we see the ensemble frozen in silhouette before a gorgeously lit back-drop on the cottonfield at 4 a.m. The number begins with the male chorus singing passionately and builds as we see the sun rise and the female dancers join, which creates a breathtaking effect.

The performances range from exceptional to merely ordinary. Gwendolyn Y. Ricks as Lutiebelle, the girl Purlie finds to assist him and eventually marries, just about walks off with the show. A singer equally adept with both a ballad and an uptempo number, she turns in a wonderful, energetic performance of high caliber and versatility.

As Purlie, Leroy Blair is less effective. A good singer and impressive presence in the pulpit, when the script asks him to extend his range he falls flat. He missed capturing Purlie's extra flamboyance and charisma that would have been the anchor of the play.

Several fine performance were turned in by Fran Tayor-Anderson, as Purlie's sister-in-law, Nathaniel Leslie Anderson as her husband and David N. Gottlieb as the Ol' Cap'n, as well as David Quinn Breseke as his son. However, if Breseke had carried a guitar instead of a banjo, he could have walked onstage with the cast of Hair and not be noticed, with his hairdo, headband, beads and costume.

With the exception of statically staging "Down Home," a number that didn't lend itself to choreography, and leaving us to watch the spectacle of two people sitting in one spot singing for seven minutes, Walter Boughton's direction kept the pace of the play fast and the energy high. And as the audience applauded in rhythm, while the cast sang a reprise of "Walk Him Up the Stairs," the opening and closing number of the show, they had to admit that Purlie had done its job, making a cold February night just a little bit warmer.

Police seek suspect in tire iron assaults

By TINKER READY
Special to the Collegian

It is not safe these days for a woman driving alone to pull over to assist a stranded motorist, and recent incidents on Interstate 91 and in Holyoke and South Hadley have been violent reminders of just how cautious women must be.

Connecticut, Holyoke and South Hadley are working with the Springfield Crime Prevention Bureau (CPB) to find a man who is suspected on one rape and five other tire iron beatings and attempted assaults on lone women driving in the area.

Just after midnight on the morning of January 22, a woman driving on I-91 in Springfield was flagged down by a man who motioned to her that something was wrong with one of her tires.

She pulled over and the man borrowed her tire iron, he said, to tighten the wheel of her car. Instead, he beat her over the head with it. The victim required hospitalization, according to Springfield police.

Hartford State Police reported two similar incidents occurring on I-91 in Connecticut less than an hour before the Springfield attack.

Similar but more brutal assaults were reported about eight weeks ago in South Hadley and Holyoke. A woman was raped and severely beaten with a tire iron, after stopping her car on Easthampton Road in Holyoke. Both of her arms were broken in the struggle, police said.

A week before, a woman was beaten and robbed after she stopped her car on the Muller Bridge in South Hadley. On the same day the car of another South Hadley woman was repeatedly rammed in the back by a car behind her.

"It is the feeling of myself and others that these incidents are linked," said Captain Williams of the Springfield Crime Prevention Bureau, "The descriptions of the assailant and the incidents themselves indicate that they were committed by one man."

He said that he hopes women in the Amherst area who may have had an experience with this man will come forward with any information that may assist in the investigation.

Captain Williams also said that the CPB is conducting an "active investigation," and that they have some "very interesting leads."

He warned women against hitchhiking alone and said that "they should at least take a good look at the person before they get in the car."

Springfield Police have released a composite drawing of the suspect. He drives a light colored, tan or beige four door car.

The phone number of th CPB is 1-785-5841.

Senior's death apparent suicide

UMass senior Donald B. Roeder, 21, died Thursday night after he apparently jumped from the eighth floor of his residence, Mullamara dormitory in the Sylvan Residential Area, authorities reported.

Roeder, who fell to his death at about 10:15 p.m., would have been 22 years old Friday.

There were no witnesses, although students notified authorities when they saw Roeder on a third-floor deck, where he landed, police said. Police termed the incedent an apparent suicide.

Survivors include his parents, Mr. and Mrs. Harold I. Roeder, Jr.; three brothers and his maternal grandmother Mrs. Charles A. Blake, all of Holden.

Funeral services are scheduled for 11 a.m. tomorrow at St Francis Epicopal Church, 1147 Main St., Holden. Burial will be private.

In lieu of flowers, friends may donate to the Donald B. Roeder Scholarship Fund at Washusett Regional High School, Holden.

Coalition develops to support Ward Commission's proposals

By RICHARD NAGLE
Collegian Staff

As a result of Legislative recommendations by a Special Commission Concerning State and County Buildings, which call for "a total reorganization of the management of public construction in Massachusetts," a new, informal coalition has been formed to lobby for those reforms.

The Special Commission, better known as the Ward Commission after its chairman former Amherst College president John Ward, found that state construction practices were "confused, inefficient, wasteful of tax dollars, and susceptible to influences." Because of its findings the commission submitted a sweeping legislative reform package in December.

The new coalition was recently formed to support the commission's proposals beginning in February when the reforms go before the Joint Committee on State Administration.

UMass representative, including the Student Center for Education Research and Advocacy and Legal Services Office have met with the League of Woman Voters, Common Cause, MassPIRG, and the Massachusetts Teachers Association and others to coordinate support for the Ward Commission's recommendations.

SCERA Advisor Evan Johnston, former 14-year member of the UMass Building Authority said of the sweeping reforms, "This is the most signifigant legislation to face the state in a long, long time."

Johnston, who in addition to organizing the support group, has met with SCERA's Legislative Director Ken Maoskowski and members of the commission's staff to ensure specific mention of the state's Building Authorities is included in the legislative package.

The UMass Building Authority was responsible for the construction of many campus buildings, including the Campus Center and Garage, Alumni Stadium, dining commons and the Southwest, Orchard Hill and Sylvan Residential Areas.

Johnston said the building authorities have remained autonomous of the state government so far. "In retrospect,"he said, "I feel there are insufficient guidelines concerning policies and procedures, especially with the UMBA."

The Bureau of Building Construction oversaw the construction of the UMass library, Tilson steam power plant, and several University classroom buildings. The commission has recommended the replacement of the BBC with a new Bureau of Project Management.

Mosakowski recommended write their state legislator calling for passage of the reforms. "After all, students are the ones who will use the buildings, he said.

"Given the combined membership of the groups (in the coalition(there are about 300,000 people behind it (the reforms)," Johnston said.

Selective service comes to the select few

JOE QUINLAN

Timmy Boyle and I were drinking buddies and friends during our high school days in Lowell. Every Friday and Saturday, between six and seven p.m., the two of us and a few others would go to Shamrock's in Tewksbury's Stadium Plaza, or Turcotte's in the Lowell Flats neighborhood, and buy our evening supply of Miller Lites. We'd park our cars on the road, near Cawley Memorial Stadium and talk about sports or other things and drink our beers. To end the night, it'd be pizza at the Walbrook in Dracut or Tony's across from the Immaculate Conception Church in Lowell, or subs at Santoro's by the housing project on Gorham Street.

It was a regular thing, this weekend drinking down the road, but it came to a sudden end on a hot night in June, 1976 when Timmy and I and 745 other kids received our diplomas and became alumni of Lowell High School.

I undertook a four year educational venture at UMass, and Timmy enlisted for a three year stint with the United States Army.

Last year, when I was a junior, Timmy ended his Army career. I haven't seen him much since then, but I'm told he's working at a Lowell bank and keeping his nose clean. I'm sure he's also considering college, too.

Ever since the draft ended several years ago, thousands of Timmy Boyles have placed their lives on hold and volunteered their services too one of the branches of the American armed forces. While very few of these volunteers saw combat duty, they had placed themselves in a position to die.

In these years of the volunteer Army, millions of dollars have been spent to lure volunteers into boot camp. Many of these recruits have been poor, unemployed blacks and whites (who had attended schools like Lowell High.) And as these kids were recruited, there were no cries of protest from the socially-responsible community of academia. But now, when everyone may be required to become available for a stint in the Army, cries of American corporate imperialism are being echoed across college campuses.

Here in Amherst, we've already seen two protests against the return of the draft.

Dorchester kids—the kind of kids like my friend Timmy Boyle—lasts week told a Boston newspaper that they're willing to register, fight, and if necessary, die. But this past Saturday, college students gathering at the Amherst town common declared that they're morally against death and violence, and the draft.

Editorial/Opinion

If you want something done right...

RON ALLEN

I like the Collegian; yes, I think it's about the best college newspaper I've read. Maybe you think I have no literary taste. Indeed, it's become trendy of late to knock our newspaper. My economics professor knocked it, my roommate knocked it, and when I told somebody that I wrote an article for the Collegian, that person knocked it also. When people knock something long enough, it falls down.

Our generation seems to be quite adept at knocking things. You see it here at UMass. We knock the student government, the student newspaper, and we complain about situations in and out of the University. Then, after a few beers or a T.V. show, everything is forgotten. We should all be offended when the media labels us the 'me' generation, yet I would agree that it definitely characterizes too large a percentage of today's younger crowd. Too many of us seem frighteningly passive in terms of community activities.

Recently it has been theorized that one long term effect of prolonged television viewing among children is an inability or a lack in inclination to become meaningly involved with other people and the world about them. This is shocking. Most students here at UMass grew up in the late fifties and sixties, a period when television viewing among children grew rapidly and unchecked. I'm not one to blame television for all of society's ills, but I consider its proliferation an important factor in this genration's passivity. Whatever the factors are, too many people around here seem to knock things or criticize situations without taking action.

It is reassuring, however, that just about every student finds the stack of Collegians in the concourse each day and grabs one. And when it's a bit late, they grumble. After reading this daily necessity, people complain about it, saying such things as "the news is scant, the editorials senseless, and the cartoons offensive." They forget the beauty of an uncensored, student run daily newspaper, and they forget all the times they have used the paper for obtaining information. More importantly, they forget that improvement comes not by knocking something but by adding to it. I like the Collegian.

University's image: What we allow

TONY SCIOLI

The reputation of this University is deteriorating at an ever increasing pace. The libelous publications of ill-informed journalism have given the public a view of this University that has received little opposition. Reflect, momentarily, on the number of times your friends back home asked, "Is it true that all they do up there at UMass is party."

It seems that the majority of the public has an opinion of this University based on the observations of teenagers who frequent the grounds between the hours of 8 p.m. Friday and 2 a.m. Sunday. The hypocrisy exercised by these individuals amazes me. They speak as viewers of by standers, though they are often the very ones responsible for the havoc brought upon people and property.

Fortunately, a great deal of students here realize that much of the "violence and vandalism we are famous for" is actually a product of outside invasion. Unfortunately, few of us write articles about this University in local or national publications. More unfortunately, someone from Boston magazine did. Apparently, that magazine knows little about the school but much about yellow journalism, poor taste, and one-sided reporting.

When I first learned of the above mentioned article, I felt that, when added to the library situation, it would drive the reputation of this school to uncharted depths. Evidently, a gentleman from Chicago named Paul Harvey was doubtful. Last semester, on the Monday proceding Halloween weekend, Mr. Harvey, on his national radio broadcast, said words to the effect of "two days of violence, vandalism, and widespread destruction have just ended at the University of Massachusetts at Amherst." Some people would defend this statement, by claiming freedom of speech, or that it is simply a case of "telling it like it is." I cannot approve of this action. It is blatant sensationalism and, given the lack of adequate coverage and the scope of potential listeners, it is an injustice and should be criticized without delay.

I agree with those who believe our goal should be involvement with the correction of civic and world disruption. God knows the past year has brought its share. The fact is, that to command attention and make a difference when controversial issues arise, a person or group must first be respected. If at any time, at any place, whether it is at the site of a nuclear reactor or on the steps of the statehouse, you or your group say something or does something in the name of a cause, you will be identified with this school, and like it or not, the public will judge you and your group according to the school and its reputation. (How often do you hear, "a group of students from the University of Massachusetts yesterday...")

While it is obvious that the image the public holds of this University is crucial to all our interests, a recurring itch for publicity often causes us to overlook this fact

I suppose, then, if there is any purpose to this article it is to encourage the students here to back this school. You are the only ones that really know what is happening here. Without your voice an accurate depiction of life here is impossible. It would be a decent thing to do even if this school were mediocre. It is a crime to not do it when the school is excellent.

I am not suggesting that criticism be curtailed or suppressed. Should that happen this school would regress to the level of those private schools where criticism is lacking, funds are in abundance, and the status of mere enrollment allows education to become an option.

Concerns of Amnesty: All political prisoners

To the Editor:

In response to a letter which appeared in last Thursday's Collegian concerning Amnesty International's position on the situation in Iran, I would like to offer some clarification.

The assumption expressed in Mr. Perkins' letter—that I, as a member of Amnesty International, do not care about the plight of the American hostages held in Tehran—simply is not true.

Amnesty International is opposed in all cases to violations of human rights, and the world has evidence that such violations have occurred under the present regime and the regime of the Shah who was deposed in February of last year.

Amnesty has expressed its great concern for the welfare of the American hostages by appealing many times since November 1979 to the revolutionary government to secure their release.

My original letter to the Collegian was an attempt to inform the campus community that Amnesty is concerned for all political prisoners under all circumstances. Yes, I "give a damn" about my fellow countrymen and women. And Amnesty International gives a damn, too.

Financial aid hotline offers beneficial info

By LAURA OWENS
Special to the Collegian

College students all over Massachusetts now have an opportunity to recieve free, accurate and hassle–free information regarding financial aid.

Financial aid offices at colleges anc universities around the state have, in conjunction with the Board of Higher Education, recently established a toll–free Financial Aid Hotline.

The hotline was established as a solution to the increasing amount of parent and students complaints concerning unavailability of information.

Upon dialing the 800 number, a student is told how to apply, where to apply and what to apply for; the three general types of campus–based student aid: College Work Study, Basic Educational Opportunity Grant (BEOG), and the National Direct Student Loan; deadlines for applications; details on the Basic Higher Education Program and any other additional information requested.

The hotline is designed to help, and State Rep. James G. Collins, D–Amherst, believes it will be successful. He said he sees it as a step toward providing all students with an equal opportunity for aid. On a person-to-person basis, it is friendly, relaxed and devoid of long waiting lines. Collins priased the local colleges for instituting the hotline saying, "Most of the credit goes to the local financial aid directors who were concerned about the present system and took the initiative to act."

According to UMass Assistant Financial Aid Director, Arthur Jackson, about 14,400 students here are now receiveing some form of financial assistance. And Collins cites a conservative figure of another 10-15 percent who are eligible and don't know it.

The number is 1-800-822-2037.

FBI: Reps guilty of political corruption

WASHINGTON (AP) —Eight members of Congress have been implicated in an FBI investigation of political corruption that was carefully monitored at the highest levels of the Justice Department to avert instances of entrapment, sources said Sunday.

The sources said that FBI director William Webster and top Justice Department lawyers closely policed the probe and that the FBI was never the first to suggest bribes to public figures. One source familiar with the investigation said flatly that videotape evidence will show there was no entrapment.

"Informants and lawyers who came to them brought in officials seeking bribes," he said.

as representatives of an Arab sheik offering bribes to win a casino gambling license and other favors.

At least 20 public officials and 10 lawyers and businessmen were implicated over 14 months, a source familiar with the investigation said. It is the largest investigation of political corruption that the FBI has ever undertaken.

The source, who asked not to be named, said that FBI agents paid out almost $500,000 in cash to the officials, although fewer than 10 of them took money. "Some arranged meetings or did other favors," the source said.

In addition to state and local officials in New Jersey and Pennsylvania, the source said those who became subjects of the probe were: U.S. Sen. Harrison A. Williams, Jr., D-N.J., and U.S. Reps. John M. Murphy, D-N.Y.; Frank Thompson, Jr., D-N.J.; Michael O. Myers, D-Pa.; Raymond F. Lederer, D-Pa.; John W. Jenrette, DS.C.; John P. Murtha, D-Pa., and Richard Kelly, R-Fla.

Those contacted denied any wrongdoing.

Sources said that Webster and Assistant Attorney General Philip Heymann watched closely to avoid entrapment, which is a frequent risk in undercover investigations and constitutes a defense against conviction.

To wage a successful entrapment defense, attorneys must prove the law enforcement officer instigated the crime and that the defendant was not otherwise predisposed to join in it.

But one source said, "The FBI undercover men never were the first to suggest bribes to the subjects. Originally, they weren't even investigating political corruption, but running a phony fencing operation for stolen art, stocks and bonds. Informants and lawyers who came to them brought in officials seeking bribes."

As another protection against entrapment, the FBI videotaped some of the ostensible bribery transactions, including some in an expensive house in the fashionable Georgetown section of Washington. "When the videotapes are shown, it'll prove there wasn't entrapment," said one source.

The reports prompted a weekend conference of Republican congressmen, governors and other officials in Easton, Md., to urge an "immediate, full, impartial" investigation of the charges by congressional ethics committees.

The FBI investigation was conducted in five cities and several points in between, according to several sources. The cities were Washington, New York, Philadelphia, Miami, and Newark, N.J.

One source said the locations used for meetings included the Barclay Hotel in Philadelphia, the Twin Bridges Marriott in the Washington suburbs, the Plaza Hotel in New York, and a condominium in Ventnor, N.J., near Atlantic City.

About 100 FBI agents began interviewing the 30 subjects of the probe on Saturday to advise them of the investigation, read them their rights and question them. "Most of them told the FBI to go to hell," said one source.

No charges have been filed, nor arrests made, but several sources said federal officials were planning to present their evidence to one or more grand juries, perhaps as early as this week.

One source familiar with the investigation gave this account of it:

The FBI did not begin the operation as a political corruption investigation. Its New York office proposed nearly two years ago a complicated undercover "sting" probe in which agents posed as fences willing to buy stolen art and financial instruments.

The fencing operation went undercover in the summer of 1978. In order to give it legitimacy in the eyes of criminals, the FBI men asked an informant for a favor.

To the surprise of the FBI, the informant volunteered the names of lawyers, local officials and congressmen who might help. This turned the probe toward political corruption in November 1978.

As more and more figures were lured by the bait of cash bribes, the probe "grew like Topsy" during 1979, eventually involving seven undercover FBI men and 100 other agents backing them up.

The FBI men and others helping them posed as businessmen and even as Arabs representing a wealthy sheik who wanted a gambling license in Atlantic City

Frances Crowe, a representative of Mobilization for Survival and the American Friends' Service Committee, called Carter's proposals a means of protecting our interests in natural resources around the world. "We are the victims of a few very wealthy people in this country who are exploiting the rest of the world to maintain their high standard of living," she said.

Crowe, 60 , also called on draft-age people to avoid registering for Conscientious Objector Status, because it would undermine efforts to oppose the draft. "We don't have a draft yet," she said, "and I'm not open to considering personal solutions"

Conscientious Objector Status is defined by federal law as available to those who, because of religious, moral, or ethical considerations, are opposed to participating in war or combat. Conscientious Objectors during the Vietnam War were given non-combat duty or alternative sevice in organizations such as the Peace Corps.

Charley Bagli, a member of the Valley People's Movement and the Revolutionary Communist Youth Brigade, spoke of his experiences in the early 1970's with the draft. Bagli obtained conscientious objector status in 1972, at the end of the Vietnem War. Bagli said the draft proposals are the result of pressure by the military. "The volunteer army hasn't worked. Drug addiction is rampant," he said.

At one point Bagli attempted to burn a draft card in front of the cheering crowd, but high winds prevented him. "We are trying to make these things museum pieces, " he shouted.

Joy Krementz, a staff member at the Trap Rock Peace Center in Deerfield, spoke of the need for disassociating the issue of equal rights from that of the draft. "It seems Carter is trying to tell us we can't be feminists without supporting the draft," she said. "The issue here is not about equal rights, it's about killing."

Other speakers included David Tuft, a Hampshire College student and member of the Hampshire Coalition for Peace through Disarmament, Harold Williams, a retired laborer and 30-year member of I.E.U.local #88, and Anne Griffin, a Smith College student and a membber of the Smith Disarmament Task Force.

The demonstrators were also entertained by Tom Giorvitch, a folk singer who led them in some of the 1960's protest songs, and two folk singers from Hampshire College.

Many of the demonstrators carried signs in the march which preceded the rally. The signs included ones which read "Keep the Peace, Save Gas" and "We won't fight another rich man's war". At the rally itself, one prominently displayed banner, held next to a large American flag, said "We love our country but we won't die in vain."

The marchers also kept up a series of chants, ranging from old standby's such as, "Hell no, we won't go" to "Conservation not annihilation."

Substitute teacher shortage reported

BOSTON (AP) — Faced with a shortage of substitute teachers, the Boston School Department is recruiting college seniors to fill in for absent teachers.

The list of 600 substitutes, which the department formerly found sufficient, no longer is, said Joan F. McAuliffe, head of the Office of Teacher Placement.

She said about 450 substitutes are needed each school day, and on 50 of the first 85 days of this school year, not all teacher absences could be covered.

When advertising didn't add enough names to the substitute list, the department contacted about 15 area colleges and, for the first time, offered substitute jobs to seniors.

As of the middle of last month, 41 seniors had applied to substitute, and 19 had been approved.McAuliffe said the substitute list was increased to 635 to 640.

Substitute teachers are exempted from state certification laws. State Education Commissioner Gregory Anrig told the Boston Sunday Globe he would prefer school districts to use certified teachers as substitutes but understood the problem.

TI calculators are helping solve Olympic scoring problems.

Get a problem solver
that's solving problems in the real world.

The more your courses approach the problems of the real world, the more you need a calculator that's already there.

These two programmable calculators from Texas Instruments can take you from your engineering courses right into the ranks of professionals like the ones who created the complex programs to simplify and speed up scoring at the Winter Olympics.

The TI Programmable 58C lets you spend your time learning concepts instead of working problems. $130*.

Perhaps your current calculator can solve advanced engineering problems, but you'll probably spend a lot of time doing it. With the TI-58C's 480 program steps or up to 60 memories, plus 170 keyboard functions and operations, you'll be amazed at just how much of the work the TI-58C will do for you.

The TI-58C has a Constant Memory™ feature that lets you lock a program in the machine — even when it's turned off. You can program the calculator as you learn in class and use it later to review the concept and work the problems. You can store results or data in the calculator, even if you turn it off, for later use.

The TI-58C will seem like more than a calculator — its computer-like capabilities let you design your own programs or use Texas Instruments unique plug-in Solid State Software™ modules with ready-to-use programs. A Master Library module (included with the calculator) has 25 basic programs in math, statistics, and other areas of general interest. Twelve optional library modules include programs on applied statistics, advanced mathematical routines, electrical engineering, business decisions, and much more.

With all of its capabilities and functions the TI-58C is simple to operate using TI's AOS™ algebraic operating system. The AOS entry system lets you enter problems the way they are written — from left to right — and handles up to 9 levels of parentheses in accordance with the rules of algebraic hierarchy.

With the TI-58C you'll also get a copy of Personal Programming, an owner's manual that'll help get you started in programming — even if you've never programmed before. The TI Programmable 59 goes from engineering to the Winter Olympics. $300*.

The reason the Winter Olympics chose the TI-59 for verifying scoring results at many events is the same reason it can help you get all you can from your courses — versatility.

Up to 960 program steps or up to 100 memories plus 4 types of display testing, 10 user flags, 72 labels, and 6 levels of subroutines let the power of programming help you make short work of complex problems.

Even with all the 175 keyboard functions and operations at your command, the TI-59 responds to simple AOS algebraic entry system control. So the calculator becomes part of the solution — not part of the problem.

The TI-59 uses Texas Instruments Solid State Software modules and comes with the Master Library module. You also get the added versatility and capability of magnetic cards to record your own programs. With them you can also tie into programs on modules for extended programming routines.

You'll get a copy of Personal Programming with your new TI-59 that'll help you get all the power we put into it. And the book can start you programming even if you've never tried it before.

If you're starting on the way to a career in engineering get a calculator that'll help you get there. And get one that'll continue to serve you well on the job.

See the whole line of advanced Texas Instruments calculators at your college bookstore or at other TI dealers everywhere.

JV spikers lose

By MAUREEN SULLIVAN
Collegian Staff

The men's junior varsity volleyball team lost every match it played at the New England Collegiate Volleyball League Division II Jamboree held at NOPE gym Satuday.

Playing six one–game matches, the JV fell to Bryant College 10–15, Tufts Universpty 10–15, Worcester Polytech 9–15, Providence College 3–15, Amherst 8–15 and Williams 9–15. Two other teams, Dartmouth and Middlebury, were slated to play UMass but had to leave because of 6:00 PM deadline placed on the Jamboree by the coaches.

UMass showed considerable skill in plugging up potentially dangerous dinks and spikes; play at the frontcourt consisted mostly of well–timed blocking and passing. However, penalties and a tendency to rocket the ball out–of–bounds stalled UMass, and allowed the opposition the chance to score and win.

Despite the losses, coach Al Morel was pleased with his team's performance. "I was very happy with the way the team played. Only one player on the starting lineup had played volleyball before, and we were running a very complicated offense and defense. Then the team went to the Jamboree at Boston last year, we played to kill, and did very well. However, our momentum went down after that. This year, we placed less emphasis on the Jamboree; today we just went to have a good time and see the other teams."

The JVs will play on February 16, when they travel to Williams for a quad – match with the Ephmen, Amherst, and Dartmouth.

UMass fought hard in the remaining two events, vaulting and horizontal bar, but could win by less than one-point in each contest, and the Orangemen clung to the 11-point triumph. Craig and Buegler scored a 9.40 and 8.90 respectively, in leading UMass in the vaulting competition , while Hugh O'Neall earned a fine 9.35 and Frank Cohen chipped in with an 8.85 on the horizontal bar. O'Neall earned his highest ever all-around score, 49.25, in the losing cause.

"We didn't have a great meet," said UMass coach Roy Johnson of the contest. "But, we had a lot of individual efforts, and performed respectably."

The Minutemen now set their sights on Tuesday evening, when they play host to Dartmouth and M.I.T. in a tri-meet in the Boyden Auxiliary gym.

URI pins wrestlers

By DONNA SULLIVAN
Collegian Staff

UMass and the University of Rhode Island were even going into the last four matches but a URI pin and superior decision beat out two UMass three point wins for a 24-19 victory Saturday at URI.

The matmen suffered their fourth loss of the season to the team considered first in New England and among the top 20 in the nation, according to UMass Head Coach Dave Amato.

Despite the loss, Amato was pleased with the performances. "The kids wrestled the best they have wrestled in a long time. They're (URI) good, but it was a close meet."

"If they had lost just one more match that would have meant three points from their score and three for us, and we would have won. We lost the close ones," Amato said.

UMass was in the lead 8-5 after three bouts were complete. Rich Schiarizzi, starting action off for the matmen in the 118 pound class, lost a close one 4-6. 126 pound Brian O'Boyle won by forfeit and 134 pound Doug Johnson wrestled to a tie.

142 pound Greg MacDonald fell to a tough opponent with an 11-3 record. The URI win tied the score at 8-8.

In place of 150 pound injured Kevin Murphy, Amato sent out Bryan Fawcett who could not muster an attack and fell in a superior decision win.

158 pound Mike Carroll brought the matmen back into contention with a 124 win that put UMass just one point behind the Rams.

A pin and superior decision just about nailed down the win for the Rams, a feat that another team probably could not have accomplished. 167 pound Dave McEntee was pinned and 177 pound Bob Clark fell in a superior decision, two losses for UMass that only served to compound a URI score.

With the score 13-24, two three point wins by 190 pound Bill McQuade and heavyweight John Allen could not make up the score needed to win.

Allen is still undefeated on the season, and with wins on Saturday, Carroll and McQuade each brought winning streaks to six wins.

The matmen will host the University of New Hampshire Wednesday at 7:30 in Boyden gym and on Friday will face Springfield College in Springfield.

"It will be a good match," Coach Amato said. "Springfield is ranked second in New England and if we beat them, we will be second."

Iceman helps East win

By ALEX SACHARE
AP Sports Writer

LANDOVER, Md. – George Gervin scored 34 points and rookie Larry Bird hit a three-point field goal to break a tie in overtime and lead the East to a 144-136 victory over the West Sunday in the 30th annual National Basketball Association All-Star Game.

The East blew a 17-point fourth-quarter lead but came on to win when Bird's shot from the left side snapped a 136-136 deadlock with 1:40 left in the five-minute overtime.

Eddie Johnson of Atlanta followed with a layup for the East, Houston's Moses Malone sank one free throw and then Bird, Boston's rookie star, tipped a loose ball to Gervin for a layup with 49 seconds left that produced the final margin.

It only was the second time the All-Star Game has gone into overtime. The other was the fourth game of the series, on Jan. 21, 1954, when the East beat the West 98-93 in New York.

Gervin, the 6-foot-7 guard of the San Antonio Spurs who leads the league with a 33.6 average and is gunning for his third straight scoring title, had 13 points in the third period when the East surged from a halftime tie to a 108-91 lead with a 44-point period.

But the West came back, using a lineup that had centers Kareem Abdul-Jabbar and Jack Sikma on the floor at the same time. The West reeled off 11 straight points early in the fourth quarter and finally drew even 120-120 on a driving basket by Paul Westphal with 3:14 to play.

Westphal, of the Phoenix Suns, had three more baskets in the final 2:25, the last one tying the score at 128-128 with 17 seconds to play. Bird missed a jumper in the closing seconds and Julius Erving of Philadelphia failed on a tip-in for the East at the buzzer.

Orange drops gymmen

By BOB MITCHELL
Collegian Staff

Steve Chilinski and Jon Bean scored all-around scores of 51.40 and 49.55 in leading Syracuse University past the UMass men's gymnastics team 255.35-244.80, Saturday at Syracuse.

The Minutemen started off the afternoon on a high note, winning the floor exercise event 44.80-42.30. Dave Buegler scored a fine 9.30 and Steve Craig earned a 9.25 to give UMass a slim edge after the battle on the mats.

Syracuse came right back, however, to take the next three events, pommel horse, still rings, and parallel bars. Ed Saunders led the way for the Orangemen on the horse, tallying an excellent 9.45, while Paul O'Neill topped the list of UMass competitors in the event with a 7.85. It was the most crucial event for the Minutemen, as Syracuse dominated 40.35 to 32.45.

Syracuse received good efforts from Chilinski and Bean on the Rings to take their second event of the meet by an even three-points, 43.65-40.65. Dave Fellemen looked strong for the Minutemen, scoring an 8.95, but the Orangemen were up 126.30-117.10 at the halfway point of the meet.

The Syracuse duo continued to perform well and led the home team to their third straight event victory in the parallel bars competition, by a three-point margin. Bob Donahue did well on the bars for the Minutemen, earning an 8.75.

Hoopwomen win again

By DANNY GUIDERA
Collegian Staff

Two basketball streaks met their end over the weekend. One, well, you know about that one. In the other one the Minutewomen ended the 28-game winning streak of Bishop's University of Quebec as they downed the Gaiters 86 – 76 Saturday night at the Curry Hicks Cage.

After playing the Canadian team even throughout most of the first half, the Minutewomen went to work in the second, quickly running up a lead that saw UMass ahead by as much as 11 at 10:55 and 12 later in the game.

Center Julie Ready led the scoring pace for the Minutewomen as she hit for 30 points on the night. Sue Peters, who exploded for 14 in the second half wound up with 22 on the night.

Peters and Ready opened the scoring for UMass as the two netted 24 of the MInutewomen's first 31 points to pull ahead 31 – 25 midway through the first half after trailing the Gaiters by three earlier on.

However, Bishop's University, the number three rated team in Canada was not to be had so easily, as the Gaiters stormed back on baskets by Debbie Hubbard (23 points for the game) and Diane Murphy (her only hoop of the game) to tie the score at 35 with 3:01 left. Another hoop and a 15 footer by Sue Hyland (10 points) gave the Quebecois a 41 – 37 advantage with 58 ticks remaining on the clock. However this four – point margin was short – lived as the Minutewomen, on a pair of free throws by Marlene Susienka and a short jumper by Ready at 0:11, tied the game at 41 as the first twenty minutes ran out.

The Gaiters and the Minutewomen traded buckets early in the second quarter until Ready hit from under the hoop to put UMass up for good, 47 – 45 at 17:26.

The Minutewomen had a chance at putting the game out of reach when Peters sunk a 15 – foot – jumper to hike the Umass lead to 60 – 49. The Canadians rallied quickly however, and cut the UMass lead to five in the next two minutes. The Gaiters were nontheless thwarted by perfect free throw shooting in the next minute by Tricia Corcoran (6 points – all in the second half), Peters, and Ginger Legare, who continues to be dynamite in the second half (19 points – – 12 in the second half) to put the Minutewomen up 68 – 57.

Bishop's University could not crack the Minutewomen advantage after that. The closest they came to getting back in the game was when they cut the UMass lead to eight at 3:02, but by then it was too late. Peters hit two free throws with 0:02 left on the clock to ice the victory at 86 – 76 and send the Gaiters back to Quebec 28 – 1.

The victory is the Minutewomen's fifth straight and moves their record to 11 – 6 on the season. Three victories in a week including a win over New England leader Provicence College put UMass in good shape for the latest NE Poll to be released later this week.

Divers do well, swimmers don't, URI dunks UM

By SCOTT SOLOMON
Collegian Staff

KINGSTON, RI – There seemed to be a general consensus that there would be better days.

"I wasn't as good as I should have been," explained diver Dan Anthony rather apologetically following UMass' 83-30 loss to Rhode Island Saturday.

"You still finished first in the three-meter," he was reminded.

My knee (which was swollen because of strained tendons) bothered me a little," he went on, "But that shouldn't have mattered."

It was indeed a long afternoon for the Minutemen, who watched their Rhode Island opponents take 12 of 13 events. From the opening gun, UMass did not show the fluency or consistency which gave it its only victory thus far (1-3), a 58-55 affair against the Springfield Chiefs back in December.

For the Minutemen, the problem lay in the total frustration which they encountered during the afternoon. They simply were unable to stop the Ram surge. Although individually Rhode Island performed at only an average clip, collectively it was blistering.

Much of the Ram strength was most likely emotional. The Rhode Island swim program faces cancellation because of lack of funds, a move which is scheduled to take place next year. Each of the swimmers has taken an active part to appeal the decision, and each has quite a bit to prove before this, possibly their final season, comes to an end.

Rhode Island came out on fire in the 400-yard medley relay, as the foursome of Tom Curry, John Sundberg, Bill Foster, and Jim Catanach (3:46.4) edged out the Minutemen team of John Mulvaney, Dave Stevens, Jib Bowers, and Tom Dundon, (3:52.5).

John Sleeman recorded the fastest time for UMass this season in the 1000-yard freestyle, (10:53.4) but the effort ended in disappointment. On the strength of URI distance men Ray Palmer (10:25.6), and Peter Vetter (10:32.2), Sleeman's time was only good for a third place slot.

It was in the diving competition that UMass figured to do well, but despite a valiant effort by Anthony and Mark Vernaglia, on the one-meter board, the pair could not surpass Rhode Island's Gary Lipson who amassed a total of 196:25 points. Anthony finished with a 193.5 mark, while Vernaglia finished 10 behind him, at 183.45.

In the three-meter event, Anthony regained his power and put forth a 200-plus point performance to capture first place. Teammate John Findley turned in his best results this season, concluding the competition with a score of 192.05, which was enough for second.

The meet was an unproductive one for UMass, as the mermen registered their lowest point output of the season. Aside from its domination of first place, in the meet, Rhode Island picked up seven second place and six third place marks.

On Wednesday, UMass will host UConn at Boyden Pool, beginning at 7:00 p.m.

The Queen Mother

"QUEEN OF OUR NATION WHO FOR MORE THAN 50 YEARS HAS BEEN TEACHING, WORKING, AND BUILDING FOR AFRICAN INDEPENDENCE. THERE BY EXEMPLIFYINGHER UNDYING LOVE, DEVOTION AND FAITH IN AFRICAN PEOPLE THE WORLD OVER."

So reads a plaque given to Queen Mother Moore on June 23, 1972 by Freedom, Inc. Queen Mother who has travelled the world over and who has been the honored quest of the heads of countries throughout the world, and who is a brilliant theortician and spokesperson of the Black liberation movement for over 60 years.

Queen Mother was born in New Iberia, Louisiana, on July 27, 1898. The Queen Mother was a member of the Garvey movement from the early twenties; she joined Garvey in Louisiana and bought stock in the Black Star Line. She became an ardent member and follower of his principles. Queen Mother completed only the fourth grade of her formal education, but was encouraged to speak by many scholars, and so she became a defender of her people's liberty.

In 1958 Queen Mother founded The Universal Association of Ethiopian Women, Inc., which was organizaed to fulfill the grave existing needs of Africans born in America and to establish working relationships with our brothers and sisters throughout the world. The Ethiopian Women are devoted to rehabilitating the youth of the world, and to assist our people who are educationally and economically handicapped; and to encourage awareness of our African identity and to restore the dynamic African force to the world.

The Universal Association of Ethiopian Women was incorporated in New Orleans, Louisiana, in August 1958, as a non profit organization. Chief among its purposes was to abolish the slave term "negro" as incompatible with our goal of self determination as an African people. The names of the first members of the Board of Directors were Queen Mother Moore, Founder-President; Mother Loretta Langley; Alma Dawson; O'Selah Parker; and the late extraordinary leader, Eloise Moore (who was an advisor to Malcolm X).

The achievements of The Ethiopain Women are a tribute to their self sacrifice and total commitment to the cause of universal liberation of African people where ever they may be.

In the current struggle, The Ethiopian Women forged ahead. In the early days the Association worked diligently in the South to save the lives of young black men scheduled for execution. There was no effort to save them by any other group. At first The Ethiopian Women prayed but as the day of execution drew near, Queen Mother stood up before them and asked- "Didn't Scripture have something to say about God helping those who helped themselves: Women! Let's get off our knees and act!" They did. Soon they collected evidence, raised money, engaged lawyers and as Ethiopian Women accomplished all that was necessary to save the lives of condemned black men. Queen Mother went from door to door to raise funds for the innocent men. Toward this end she travelled from East to West, from South to North pleading for justice.

The Ethiopian Women were successsful in having 23,000 families put back on welfare after they were cut off by Washington for no apparent reason. The Ethiopian Women demanded that Washington hold a judicial hearing to show cause why these families had been cut off of aid. The Ethiopian Women were victorious. The families were restored to the rolls once again.

The Ethiopian Women concluded that the problems of Africans here in the United States were so great that their case should be brought before the U.N. The U.N. officials informed them they could not be received unless they were a nation. This motivated them to meet and declare "ourselves a nation- a captive, non-self governing nation." It was Eloise Moore, who made arrangements for the meeting between the Association and the U.N. officials. Only five women were received. The second time the Association appeared before the U.N. it was to gather world sentiment against executions.

The Ethiopian Women on the centennial of the "emancipation of the slaves" a document discovered in an old text, that stated that the statue of limitations for a people is 100 years. "A people is assumed content to belong to its oppressor if during the 100 years it did not place a judicial demand before its captors." The Ethiopian Women felt that now was the time to place a judicial demand before the United States. They mobliized for the Centennial without funds. Queen Mother travelled the country to inform the people of the urgency of making demands now "on behalf of our unborn generations." a Document was drawn up demanding reparation and was presented to the Courts.

Some of Queen Mother's service to the people over the 60 years have included the following activities:

YOUNG MEXICAN-ALIEN WOMEN RAPED AND MURDERED BY U.S.IMMIGRATION OFFICER

According to a report in the N.Y. Times on February 1, Michael Kennedy a 24-year-old security officier assigned to the immigration and Naturalization Services border station at San Ysidro, California, was charged by the Justice Department with the rape and murder of Maria Lopez de Felix, a 19-year-old Mexican woman from Tijuana, Mexico.

The Federal District Court contended that Mr. Kennedy had "enticed the woman" to give him sexual favors in return for being allowed to enter the U.S., after she was discovered by "La Migra" on November 25 hiding in the trunk of an automobile driven by her sister in law through the port of entry at San Ysidro. She was detained for a brief period of questioning in which she had agreed to return voluntarily to Mexico.

"Based of physical evidence found at the scene. The Justice Department has accused Mr. Kennedy of raping and strangling the woman in an abandoned customs building.

Mr. Kennedy has been a suspect since last March in the murder of Ramona Hernandez, another Mexican woman from Ensenada, Mexico, on an Indian Reservation not far from San Ysidro. She had also come through the port of entry at San Ysidro shortly before she was murdered. The N.Y. Times also reported that "Mr Kennedy had admitted escorting the woman from the border inspection station to the immigrant service office at San Ysidro and that her address and telephone number had been found in his pocket."

Although he was a suspect in Mrs Hernandez murder, the Federal Protective Service had kept Mr Kennedy on duty at San Ysidro until three weeks ago, when he was arrested as a material witness in the murder of Mrs Lopez. However, he was released right away pending the filing of formal charges. Now he was ordered held without bond by the U.S. Magistrate in San Diego. He can get life in prison.

INFERNO IN GUATEMALA

Guatemala, Jan. 31. More than 30 people were reported killed here today after militant peasants occupied the Spanish Embassy and the police stormed the building to oust them.

A fire broke out during the fighting, apparently as a result of a gasoline bomb explosion , and at least 14 burned bodies were found.

According to the police, the embassy attack was staged by the peasants to dramatize their protest against what they described as oppression and violence by Guatemalan Government forces against fellow peasants in Quiche, about 90 miles to the north.

The Spanish Ambassador, Maximo Cajal y Lopez, who was slightly wounded in the fighting, said that the police action against the peasant attackers "was brutal." He said he and his staff could have settled the matter in a peaceful way.

Among those in the embassy during the occupation were the former Guatemalan Vice President, Eduardo Caceres Lehnhoff, and former Foreign Minister Adolfo Molina Orantes. Their fate was not known immediately.

About 50 policeman surrounded the building after the occupation, then took up positions on the first and third floors, isolating the second-floor embassy offices. A police spokesman theorized that the fire might have resulted from a molotov cocktail.

The spokesman said that the peasants belonged to a group from the northen region of Quiche that friefly took over two radio stations in the capital on Monday and held meetings to publicize demands for the release of colleagues they said had been arrested.

Guatemalan Jesuit priests recently published a document here accusing the Government of repression against the country's Indians and peasasts. The document charged that "in our country there is kidnapping, torture and assassination" and said Government statistics for the first 10 months of 1979 showed that more than 3,000 KILLINGS were committed by a clandestine paramilitary group called the "death squad."

S.A.Troops Raising Diplomatic Storm in Africa

[AN] In spite of British efforts to dismiss African reaction as largely for show, the admitted presence of South African troops in Rhodesia at the Beitbridge crossing to South Africa is generating increasingly strong protest among African countries. Late last week the Organization of African Unity Liberation Committee decided to call for an emergency meeting of the United Nations Security Council to discuss the British administration of Rhodesia.

African concern has been mounting all month at evidence of British bias presented by the Patriotic Front, including the use of Bishop Muzorewa's auxiliaries in rural areas, the mobilization of Rhodesian government forces against guerrillas who have not yet reported to the cease-fire camps, the killing of seven ZAPU guerrillas on January 11 by Rhodesian troops, and British Governor Lord Soames' six months extension of the state of emergency which has been in effect since 1965.

Soames evidently assumed that admitting the presence of 250 South African troops at Beitbridge would convince world opinion that the matter was a minor one, thereby deflecting attention from the several thousand other South African troops generally admitted by observers to be dispersed among the Rhodesian forces. Official spokespersons have also sought to minimize the complaints by suggesting that only Robert Mugabe's ZANU was expressing serious concern. Administration communiques have attributed cease-fire violations almost exclusively to ZANU guerrillas and noted that a higher proportion of ZAPU guerrillas have reported to the camps. They have also demanded that ZANU release some 70 party dissidents still held in Mozambique.

The South African troop presence is such a highly emotional issue in Africa, however, that it is galvanizing African support for the criticism of Britain's role. Frontline leaders meeting in Beira on January 10 issued a strong communique criticizing the British implementation of the agreement. On the same day, Nigerian President Shagari accused Britain of reneging on the London settlement, and last week Nigeria's External Affairs Commissioner expressed doubts that the elections could be free and fair. OAU Chairman William Tolbert of Liberia has dispatched a message of concern to London, and Kenya has threatened to withdraw its forces from the Commonwealth monitoring force in Rhodesia.

Despite the serious nature of these protests, international news has been dominated by Iran and Afghanistan, and the Africans have had difficulty getting their message through--at least in the United States.

"Impartiality of British Exercise Called Increasingly In Doubt," ran the headline of a January 8 article in London's Financial Times, while South Africa's Financial Mail worried in its January 18 issue that African complaints might imperil international acceptance of the Rhodesian elections.

The American press, however, has tended to reflect the official British view, with African criticism either ignored completely or buried in stories with headlines like, "Mugabe's Troops Accused of Violating Truce" (Washington Post, January 16). The Kenyan threat, for example, stressed in South African, French and British reports, has received practically no attention in U.S. newspapers. And Amnesty International, which usually gets good press coverage for its reports on human rights violations around the world, reports that its January 17 press release on Rhodesia has been virtually ignored by the American news media.

The release, which followed a visit to Rhodesia by Amnesty's deputy secretary general, expressed dismay at the continued detention of up to 11,000 political prisoners. It also pointed out the Soames administration's failure to take a strong stand against torture, which has long been routine practice in the Salisbury government's counter-insurgency campaign.

And the news media's problems go beyond sins of omission. Among the most egregious examples of inaccurate reporting was a comment by correspondent John F. Burns of the New York Times. In a story on January 20, Burns asserted without qualification that "the London peace agreement says nothing about the presence of foreign troops during the campaign."

In fact, Britain conceded a special annex on foreign troops to break an early December deadlock in the conference pledging "no external involvement in Rhodesia under the British Governor." The annex further reads: "The position has been made clear to all governments, including South Africa."

The supplement containing these words was omitted from the British White Paper published on January 10, but, noted the London *Guardian*the same day, Foreign Office spokespersons claimed the omission was purely technical, and that the Beitbridge contingent of South African troops was an exception to the general commitment.

Ms Laini Brodeur (Morrison): New Indian Commissioner

By Jocelin Lee

The reason why this article about an Indian woman appears under the Asian Affairs section of this paper is because of the similarities of the Asian and Indian cultures.

There are traditional similarities in physical appearance, family, and religion.

Basically, physical appearance is similar because it is believed that the Indians originally came from Asia. There is similarity in family because they both believe in the extended family structure and relationships between men and women are similar. And there is simlarity in religion because these cultures respect humanity and the earth.

Laini Brodeur (Morrison) Assistant Business Manager of the Committee for the Collegiate Education of Black Students Program here at the University of Massachusetts has been appointed by governor Edward J. King to be the Commissioner of Indian Affairs for the Commonwealth of Massachusetts.

Ms Brodeur has been involved in many Indian organizations. Some of the organizations she has contributed to are the National Congress of American Indians, National Indian Education Association, and the Northeast Tribes Border Issues Committee. She is the chairperson in the latter organization.

She says that what propelled her into the position of Commissioner of Indian Affairs is coming up through the American National Indian Community, being the director of several Indian centers, her involvement in national Indian politics, and the fact that she kept her Indianness in modern American society. She says that although one is born an Indian, it does not neccessarily mean you are an Indian, symbolically speaking. Being an Indian is a state of mind as well as a way of life. You are responsible to your whole community. She explained that there are two ways of living and Indian life. One way is the traditional way. Indians who live the traditional lifestyle speak their own language, believe in the ancient culture and beliefs of their people, practice their own religion, and do not integrate into the predominant society. The other lifestyles for Indians to live is the non-tradtional way. Indians who live in the non-traditional way live both on and off reservation in all levels of American society, are products of formalized education, can often not speak their own language and often do not practice their own religion. They are usually acculturated to live within the bureaucracies of society.

Although Laini Brodeur is a non-traditional Indian in the literal sense, she considers herself to be both a non-traditionalist as well as a traditionalist. She is a traditionalist because she practices her Indian religion, speaks her own Mohawk language and believes in the culture of her people. She is a non-traditionalist because of her education and career oriented life. She feels she has been able to bridge the gap between traditional and non-traditional Indian life. She is accepted by both traditionalist, and non-traditionalist.

She grew up on the Caughnawaga Mohawk Reservation in Quebec, Canada. She says her family was very traditional with the exception of her parents. Her parents joined the Indian Relocation Program. This program was sponsored by the government and allowed Indians to be trained in jobs. The training offered was for the most part vocational in such areas as carpentry, secretarial, auto mechanics, hairdressers, etc. Her parents were relocated to Massachusetts. In Massachusetts Ms Brodeur had her first experience in going to school with non-Indians. While in school on the reservation, she was not aware of the differences in hierarchies. She says that in Indian society everyone is treated equally: from the smallest child to the oldest adult. When she left the reservation and began school with non Indians, she says she was treated not as an equal and was discriminated against, and made fun of because she was different. Consequently, she strove to excell academically as a way to prove to herself that she was equal to non-Indian students in their academic pursuits. At the age of fifteen she graduated from high school in North Brookfield, Massachusetts. She earned a scholarship to U.C.L.A. She excelled academically; she was always on the dean's list. She graduated with a Bachelor's degree in Business Administration. While attending U.C.L.A., she also worked evenings in a factory on an assembly line to support herself. After graduating, she worked for several years. She then returned to school at the University of New Mexico and recieved a Masters Degree in Public Administration.

While in College at U.C.L.A. she became involved in working with inmates in prison, particularly Indians inmates. The main purpose was to bring cultural awareness of American Indian to prison officials. She said her work in the prison system was a rude awakening. She became very involved with Indianness. From then on she became very politically active and started to promote the integrity of American Indians. She says as Commissioner of Indian Affairs, "I will promote the understanding of the integrity of American Indians, encourage the advancement of Indians." I will bring the concerns and wishes of the Indian people to the governor and elected officials of the state I will act as a liaison in ares such as housing, education, and employment."

She also says, "The integrity of American Indians encompasses intelligence, honesty, warmth and kindness. We can do anything we want to do. Be anything we want to be. White people took away our land, and murdered our people but they were never able to take our dignity or our pride. If it was not for my people I would not be what I am today. They taught me how to live, gave me my dreams. I'm proud of being an Indian. Being an Indian is very special."

Asian American Students Association

The Asian American is more then just looking "oriental" or "exotic." It is an experience that belongs only to Americans whose roots reach far west of our Pacific shore. You may have arrived only yesterday at a big city airport or your great grandfather may have hammered spikes to unite our nation by railroad. This may be your first time outside of Hometown USA yet your family may have travelled thousands of miles to settle there. When you smile your face is unlike the vast majority of pictures you see in magazines and on television. Your feelings are different too. Not only because you are an individual, but because you are a special kind of individual as well. You are Asian with a rich and distinct history which helps you to mold your contribution to the world of today. You are American because this is your home. Come and join other Asian Americans as we build, enjoy and change our world to a better one.

The Asian American Students' Association was conceived in 1974 by students like yourself. They, as we do now, realized that an education at UMass could be more than just going to class and studying. Once more, learning can also mean finding out about yourself as an Asian American. Since 1974 we have had social gatherings like potluck dinners, coffeehouses and dances to major regional conferences involving hundreds of people. We have supported Asian American studies at UMass and issues concerning Asian American on a national scale. The Asian American Review, a campus literary magazine is our own publication. All of this and much more is the result of willing students like yourself. Do you have an idea or a project in mind that you would like to share: Or would you like to help out on one: Whatever it is, the accent is on Asian American. Come and see us in Room 415 at the Student Union or watch the Collegian for one of our events or meeting announcements. In any case, have a little fun while doing something meaningful during your stay at UMass.

Join the Asian American Students' Association.

Coda Magazine

Third World poets, writers and artists! There are a growing number of small publications interested in publishing work concerning Third World experience. The following announcements are taken from Coda, a newsletter for poets and writers that is published bi-monthly.

Most of the announcements do not mention the payment received upon acceptance for publication. Usually payment is a few copies of the magazine and occasionally money, as the magazines are usually independently owned and do not make much profit. However, it is important for a writer to get published in as many places as possible, and these magazines often offer an outlet for beginning writers to display their work. When submitting work, it is advisable to ask about the payment if you want to be certain. You might also want to consider reading a copy of the magazine before you submit, so you could write and ask the cost of a sample copy before ordering one.

Type your work on 8½ × 11 paper neatly and double-spaced. Enclose a short letter telling a little bit about yourself. Also be sure to enclose a self-addressed stamped envelope so the editors can return your work to you. Be prepared to wait – they may hold your work for a while before they decide to accept or reject it.

A subscription to Coda costs $7/year and $12/two years. The address is Poets & Writers, Inc., 201 West 54th Street, New York. NY 10019. It is also available in the Jones Library in the center of Amherst.

Black Expressions Magazine, a new bi-monthly published by Dhati Press, needs poetry, short stories, choreopoems, and essays, preferably related to the Black Experience. The editors want to provide an outlet for talented new or unknown Black writers. Limit submissions to ten poems and no more than two short stories, which should each be 5,000 words or less. Send material to: Lorraine Harrell Sherley, Publisher/Editor, Black Expressions Magazine, Dhati Press, 407 Standish Court, Bolingbrook, Illinois 60439.

Laughing Unicorn, a new poetry quarterly, is planning three thematic issues for 1980: aging; Hispanic poets and poetry (English or Spanish); and the individual and his/her environment. Graphics and very short prose are also needed. Send submissions to Laughing Unicorn, 432 Heathcliff Drive, Pacifica, California 94044.

A wants chapbook manuscripts from 16 to 32 pages from Third or Fourth World writers. Form, content, and theme are open. The deadline is September 21, 1980. Send to William Oandasan, c/o The Program for Writers, University of Illinois at Chicago Circle, Chicago, Illinois 60680.

University wages war on rats infesting SUB

By BRUCE WARD
Special to the Collegian

Attempting to fight off a number of rat-related problems in the Student Union Building, the University is waging war on the ravenous rodents. The rats are eating away at exposed food, grain and candy in the Hatch and at the Student Union candy counter.

Rat infestation of Earthfoods, the student-run vegetarian restaurant, resulted in a temporary shut down during intersession. At least 26 rodents have been removed by pest control experts since intersession, said one employee who asked to remain anonymous. The traps, checked daily to prevent the spread of diseases such as Salmonella, a bacterial disease associated with acute inflammations in the intestines of animals, are hidden from sight behind the candy counter in order to avoid detection by customers. Earthfoods has since been cleared to reopen by Environmental Health Specialist George Reid.

"They're into the candy something fierce," said campus pest control expert Al Potter.

Reid called for the Earthfoods shutdown due to health hazards from the rat infestation. The rats were discovered by pest control experts who found evidence of the problem during a routine inspection of the building, Reid said.

The "Norway rat" is extremely unsanitary, "urinating and defecating in its own food," Reid said. Metal and plastic containers have been installed in the Earthfoods kitchen replacing the paper bags the rats were eating into.

"Our problem is solved," Earthfoods worker Louis Fuentes said. "I'd like to see the little bastards eat through these new containers," he said. Earthfoods has been cleared by Reid to open.

The Hatch, however, is still having problems with rats. Hatch Supervisor Phyllis Kessler said "There are lots of rats and they aren't going away. We've had to throw out a lot of food that they've eaten into," he said.

When asked to comment on the problem of rats in the Campus Center, Manager of Building Operations Dudley Bridges said the problem was no worse than that of any food serving area the size of the Campus Center. Director of the Campus Center William Harris said he had "no idea that there is a problem" with the rats adding, "it's the first I've heard of it.

Have you ever wondered why nothing is stocked on the bottom shelf at the S.U.B. candy counter?? If you look beneath the cardboard (lower right) you will see why. (Staff photo by Paul Price)

Allen reinstates ten sections of Spanish

By ELLEN DAVIS
Collegian Staff

Provost Jeremiah Allen announced yesterday that he has secured enough money to reinstate ten sections of Spanish cancelled last week due to lack of funds.

The announcement came at a meeting with about 25 students who had protested cancellation of the Spanish classes. If the classes had been cancelled, almost 600 students would have been affected.

Allen said he secured $11,000 for the classes from a central reserve fund controlled by the administration. The money will pay for teaching assistants for the ten classes.

"This struck me as a genuine emergency," Allen said. "The chancellor and vice-chancellor for Asministration and Finance agreed."

According to Spanish Deparment Chair Martha Francesasto, the funding will be enough to help 400 of the 600 students who would have been affected by the cuts.

"Its not complete, but its better than nothing," Francesato said. "It takes care of our most urgent needs."

Added funding will be enough to help 400 of the 600 students who would have been affected by the cuts.

Francesato noted that the Spanish Deparment has always had to turn some students away because of heavy enrollments.

Francesato said the following sections of Spanish are to be held as originally scheduled, beginning today: Spanish 110, section 1, Spanish 120, sections 9, 10, 11, 15, and 18; Spanish 126, section 2; and Spanish 130, sections 1 and 3.

Priority for the classes will be given to students already enrolled in them, graduating seniors, and students who have already taken the preceeding courses, Francescato said.

Allen's announcement drew a long round of applause from the students attending the meeting, many of whom needed the courses in question order to fulfill graduation and maior requirements.

"We went in angry and came out smiling," said Jon Oltsik, a junior English major.

Nancy Fish, a sociology major, called the announcement "a real victory." "I'm pleased, " she said, "This is very positive."

Bill to repeal minimum drinking age law filed

By BRIAN O'CONNELL
Collegian Staff

A bill co-sponsored by Amherst state Senator John W. Olver to repeal the minimum age drinking law has been scheduled for a public hearing by the Massachusetts Joint Committee on Government Regulations. The hearing will be held tomorrow at the State House in Boston.

The bill, which would reduce the drinking age once again to 18, faces an uphill battle as both the state House of Representatives and Senate must approve it, Olver said. The bill would then have to be signed into law by Governor Edward King, a staunch opponent of the 18-year-old drinking age.

Citing data released by the Registry of Motor Vehicles and Commission of Probation, Sen. Olver criticized the 20-year minimum age drinking law as an "ineffective deterrant against alcohol-related accidents."

"The facts now show that the number of teenage drunk driver arrests and the number of teenage alcohol-related fatalities have increased despite the new law," Olver said.

The law to set the minimum drinking age at 20 took effect April 16, 179 after a lengthy legislative debate in the House and Senate. Proponents of the bill to raise the drinking age have lacked adequate data indicating a need for change in the drinking age.

"The issue was legislated on the basis of emotional arguments which were not and could not be supported by any objective analysis," he said

Crimes, accidents abound; police in area kept busy

By MARK L. CURELOP
Collegian Staff

Amherst Police were busy this weekend with burglaries, car accidents, and vandalism.

Peter M. Schwarzer, a 24 year old Harvard resident was brought to the UMass Infirmary Saturday at 2:54 a.m., treated for facial injuries and released.

Schwarzer was driving North on East Peasant Street when he lost control of his vehicle, which sheared a seven-foot light pole, struck a fence, travelled over a ditch. then hit a guide pole and struck a tree. Schwarzer was cited for operating to endanger.

Jeffrey B. Rutherford, 32, of 310 Amherst St., Granby, sustained nose injuries when his car was struck by Robert M. Hauler, 20 of 103 Poole Road, Belchertown, at the intersection of South Pleasant St. and East Hadley Road.

Hauler was turning North onto South Pleasant Street, when his vehicle collided with Rutherford's traveling South on South Pleasant Street.

Rutherford was charged with operating under the influence of alcohol, and Hauler was cited for failure in care of a turn.

In a minor rash of burglaries this past weekend, Detective Sargent David Jankowski recommended residents take their names off mail boxes. "People have knocked on doors and asked for directions, or have phoned the residence bofore attempting their breaks," Jankowski said.

Two acts of Vandalism was committed Saturday morning about 3:00 a.m. at Pi Kappa Alpha fraternity, 418 North Pleasant St., Amherst.

The first concerned damage to one of the house's doors, as well as damage to the fraternity phone by unknown assailants, according to Amherst Police.

The second incident involved four men in a light colored vehicle who pulled up to the rear door and ripped the door open, after a Pike party. They threatened the members with clubs, and when confronted by members of the house, left.

UMass will host John Anderson

Republican presidential candidate John B. Anderson will be speaking at UMass tomorrow night at 6:30 in Mahar Auditorium.

The ten-term congressman from Illinois, considered the most liberal of the Republican presidential hopefuls, is expected to talk about social concerns, and how they relate to his candidacy. If time permits, the floor will be open to questions from the audience.

Anderson's stop at UMass is part of an intensive effort this month to get support in the March 4 Massachusetts primary. Although he polled only four percent of the vote in the Iowa caucuses last month, Anderson is hoping to do better in Massachusetts by adding support from Democrats and Independents.

Last week, Anderson said he must finish no lower than third in the Massachsetts primary if he is to keep alive his hopes of winning the Republican nomination.

If his standings have not improved by the first of April, Anderson says he may consider running as an independent candidate.

Anderson's visit at UMass is sponsored by the Undergraduate Political Science Association. Before speaking at UMass, Anderson is speaking at Amherst College at 4 p.m.

New Mexico prison inmates tortured, executed in riots

SANTA FE, N.M. (AP) —An execution squad armed with blowtorches and axes tortured and murdered fellow inmates during the 36 hours of hell behind the walls of the New Mexico State Penitentiary where 35 died and 15 others are missing, inmates said yesterday.

"I saw some people cutting a dude's eyes out with a cutting torch," one prisoner told reporters allowed inside the smouldering prison that was recaptured by National Guardsmen and police Sunday afternoon after a day and a half of rioting.

The horror encountered during Monday's search for more bodies caused some Guardsmen to vomit.

Fires still burned inside the compound while about [illegible] Guardsmen stood watch over 1,100 displaced inmates huddled in tents on the prison grounds to ward off freezing temperatures. State officials hunting a place to put them said they had offers of help from Arizona and Colorado.

Gov. Bruce King said 50 inmates were dead or unaccounted for in the nation's worst prison riot since the Attica uprising in 1971 left 43 people dead in New York state.

New Mexico inmates said that after the riot broke out early Saturday, executioners snatched some prisoners from their cells and tortured them with blowtorches, axes and metal rods. Some were beheaded, they said.

Prison officials said the rioters ransacked prison offices and found confidential files. That is when the bloodbath began, as the inmates rounded up informers.

Following a 36 hour seige by inmates a guard in the New Mexico State Penitentiary sifts through rubble in cell block six. Damage estimates to the prison range as high as $50 million.

FBI begins filing charges in gov't. corruption scandal

WASHINGTON (AP)—The government lodged its first criminal charges yesterday in the FBI's 14—month political corruption investigation as Congress opened its own inquiries into the undercover probe that has implicated seven House members and a senator.

The first formal charges arising from the FBI investigation were filed against an Immigration and Naturalization Service investigator in Brooklyn, N.Y.

Alexander Andrews Alexandro Jr., 29, of Commack, N.Y., was arraigned before a U.S. magistrate and was formally charged with one count of bribery and one count of conspiracy.

Officials said the government might begin presenting evidence against other public officials to several grand juries later this week.

Students safe, not affected by job freeze

By WENDY SPAKAUSKAS
Special to the Collegian

The recent hiring freeze ordered by UMass President David C. Knapp probably will not affect "03" student workers, said Larry Benedict, acting associate to the Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs Dennis L. Madson.

"To the best of my knowledge, student workers are not going to be affected by the hiring freeze at all," Benedict said yesterday.

But full-time workers will be hired only on a "critical need" basis, said Benedict. Those seeking full-time employment, must be approved by Chancellor Henry Koffler before being hired.

The order to freeze UMass hiring was issued by Knapp in response to a state hiring freeze imposed Gov. Edward J. King, said Art Clifford of the UMass News Bureau.

The hiring freeze imposed by Gov. Edward J. King, is not affecting student workers because the financial aid and work study money has not been cut back at all, said Benedict. In fact he said, financial aid and work study money available to students has been increased over the past six years.

"There has not been any backing off as far as student employment, "Student labor is much too fluid to be affected by the hiring freeze."

The hiring freeze really isn't affecting too much this year, because most full-time employees were hired before the new year, and are already under a contract, said Benedict. Next year the full-time employees will be affected.

Issues eclipse nuke problems

By MARC FAGELSON
Collegian Staff

Harvey Wasserman, a Campaign for Safe Energy leader discussed several aspects of nuclear power last night but set one as a priority: despite the crises in Iran and Afghanistan, the nuclear issue must not fade from prominence.

Because this is an election year, Wasserman "hoped the Campaign would provide a basic foundation to go to New Hampshire and other primary states to make sure the nuclear issue wasn't lost."

He stressed New Hampshire's importance because of its early primary status as well as what Wasserman called "A worldwide symbol; Seabrook."

The Campaign canvasses daily, particularly on weekends, throughout New Hampshire hoping to raise a grassroots following. As presidential candidates make their appearances in the state, the anti-nuke workers want to confront them with large, diverse crowds in an effort to elicit a clear stance on the issue, he said.

Wasserman, author of Energy War: Reports from the Front, brought up several alternatives during the talk. In addition to solar, wind, and hydroelectric power, the new photovol tanks were discussed. The tanks, which are being held back by the pro-nuclear corporations, he claimed, could be mass produced with a $500 million initial investment.

The photovol tank consists of silicon which when exposed to sunlight acts as a conductor to transfer the sun's solar energy into electricity. "They won't be released," Wasserman added, "Until the energy corporations figure out a way to buy the sun."

What holds such alternatives back from the public, he said, is the amount of money invested by the corporations in nuclear power. According to the Campaign's platform, there are over 90 plants under construction or in the planning stages. "The cost of these ninety plants represent an investment of 150-200 billion," Wasserman said.

The Campaign was formed in 1973 out of "self defense" when a nuclear plant began construction four miles outside of Wasserman's town of Montegue. On Feb. 22, 1974, Washington's Birthday, Sam Lovejoy, one of the Campaign's members made one of the first anti-nuclear statements by knocking over a $500 weather tower built for the Montegue plant. He then turned himself in to the authorities with a written statement condemning nuclear power, Wasserman said.

"The Platform will be taken to the conventions," Wasserman said. "If the organization shows enough strength, the candidates will have to acknowledge us."

Ailey American Dance Theater set for the Fine Arts Center

By SARAH HAMMANN
Special to the Collegian

The Alvin Ailey American Dance Theater will soon provide UMass audiences with this season's premiere performance. Opening Feb. 12 at the Fine Arts Center Concert Hall for a three—night visit, the company is certain to dazzle veteran audiences.

The New York City based company started under the direction of Alvin Ailey with seven dancers in 1958. The Company now includes a repertory ensemble and well—established school of dance. Founder Alvin Ailey originally danced and performed on Broadway in the early 1950's. In 1954, he started choreographing and directing and within a few years his works premiered at Jacob's Pillow.

Preview

Ailey's history includes several successful productions, such as Virgil Thomson's Four Saints in Three Acts for the Mini-Met and Samuel Barber's Antony and Cleopatra which opened the Met's eighty—eigth season.

Ailey's troupe has enthusiastically entertained audiences around the world. In the summer of '77 the U.S. State Department sponsored its international tour to sell—out houses in Japan, hong Kong, Taiwan, the Philippines, Africa and Europe. By 1970, after dedicated rehearsal and consistent quality performances, the troupe won the first prize at the International Dance Festival in Paris. In 1976, the Company's reputation had expanded to the international arena and President Carter invited them to perform at the White Houses's Inaugural Eve Gala.

The versatile Ailey has left few mediums unexplored. There are few choreographers who can move easily between ballet and modern dance. Ailey is one of them and his works offer a highly individualized blend of elements from Afro-Carribean dance, modern dance, ballet and jazz.

Alvin Ailey contributed to the nation's bicenntial with his Ailey Celebrates Ellington. Accompanied by the Ellington Orchestra, the group won the 1977NewYork Mayor's Award for Arts and Culture. Later that year, Ailey choreographed Leonard Bernstein's Mass, which opened the John F. Kennedy Center for the Performing Arts in Washington D.C.

Ailey has created a group with breadth, diversity, and vitality that no other modern dance company can rival. The UMass performances will include such Ailey classics as "Revelations," "Rainbow 'Round My Shoulder," performed at the FAC in spring '78, and a new piece, "Memories," to the music of jazz pianist Keith Jarrett.

Ailey's high—caliber dancers personify the blurring of distinctions between the two great dance ideologies, pure ballet and modern dance. As Richard Christiansen of the Chicago Daily News writes, "The Ailey troupe sets rafter a rockin'."

Tickets are now on sale at the Fine Arts Center Box Office for the Feb. 12, 13, and Valentine's Day performances. Curtain time is 8 p.m.. Treat yourself to a memorable evening.

There's a lot more of these around than you might think.

Athletes lost in Olympic politics

There are two basic attitudes concerning the planned olympic boycott. The first regards the olympics as something divorced from other world events, one of the rare chances of man to rise above the divisive hostilities of international relations by engaging in peaceful, friendly athletic competition, where attempts are made to surpass previous bounds of athletic achievement. The second purports that morality cannot be separated from any human endeavor and since the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan was a heinous action showing blatant disregard for the right of a people to choose their own government, an olympic boycott must be instituted to avoid giving tacit approval to such action. A boycott is also intended to punish the Soviet Union, perhaps pressuring them into a withdrawal of troops or at least to discourage them from further expansionist adventues.

Many of us have come to support the latter point of view with great sadness. We watched the games at Montreal on television or in person and were elated by the poetry and grace of Nadia Comaneci, the speed and power of Alberto Juantorena, the style and finesse of Sugar Ray Leonard, and the indomitable courage of Bruce Jenner. Yes, the Olympics do help us transcend the routine of our daily existence. They give us the opportunity to temporarily immerse ourselves in the glory of international athletic competition, where 10,000 of the best amateur athletes in the world make a concerted effort to expand the boundaries of human physical limitation. Our attention is diverted from the agony of the feet to the thrill of victory. Yet, there are important questions to be raised about what the Olympic Games have become.

The games originated in acient Greece and were discontinued for many years before the establishment of the modern olympics in 1896. That year in Athens there were 235 participants from 13 nations as compared with a projected 10,000 athletes from over 120 countries at the Moscow games. The Berlin Olympics of 1936 represented the first major attempt to use the games as a tool for political propaganda. Hitler put on an elaborate show in which the grandeur of the spectacle and the success of German athletes were to demonstrate to the world the power and the glory of his nation. This philosophy has been adopted by an increasing number of nations of the world, particularly by communist countries. In the Soviet Union, East Germany, and Cuba, achievement of athletic superiority has become a high national priority.

There is definite propaganda value to victory on the athletic field. Perhaps as a throwback to our tribal existence when our very survival depended on our ability to chase animals and to hurl rocks and spears, we seem to instinctively value physical excellence. There is no doubt that a nation which performs extremely well on the athletic field engenders a certain degree of respect, be it given freely by friends or begrudgingly by foes. This respect can serve to encourage emulation of the society that produces such strong, halthy, and capable individuals. Belief in this tenet has resulted in a rapid escalation of effort to produce winning athletes, and the noble beliefs associated with the practice of sport have largely fallen by the wayside. The deadly seriousness of the effort is seen in the increasing disregard for the health of performers as long as more records can be broken or additional medals won. Competitors are expected to drive themselves to the limit of their endurance and beyond. Any artificial means of improving performance is actively explored. There is a running battle between those seeking to use drugs and other artificial means to produce super athletes and those trying to enforce the rules and detect drug abuse.

Much has been said about the use of steroids by athletes, most notably in the weight events and among Eastern European women. An East German swimming medalist, who defected to the west, recently recounted how she was given white powder to ingest regularly after training. She assumed it was a vitamin, but after a period of time friends began telling her that she had become somewhat masculine in body development. Only after she had stopped taking the drug did she not a return to a more feminine physique. Lasse Viren of Finland won the 5,000 and 10,000 meter runs at Montreal but did not perform nearly so well either before or after the games. Many have attributed his olympic success to blood doping, wherein blood is withdrawn from an athlete and stored while normal blood components are replenished in the body over a period of weeks. The stored blood is then reinfused into the athlete leading to higher blood volume and red cell count, putatively improving endurance.

Does all this reflect the olympic spirit? Are we going toward a bionic games where little is left of the natural human body but it's shell? Are the games really a peaceful and brotherly alternative to war or do they only serve to incite militant nationalism?

Steps that can be taken to depoliticize the Olympics include giving the summer and winter games permanent homes in neutral countries and very strict enforcement and even expansion of restrictions against the use of artificial substances and methods in both training and competition. Hopefully, some of the more noble ideals of international athletics will someday be embodied in the Olympic games.

Nuclear debate: undemocratic

One issue in the continuing conflict over nuclear power requires no experts: It is the matter of access to unbiased, soundly based information. There have been many instances of the public, House Subcommittees, and private intervenor groups having been misled, lied to, propagandized, or denied access to pertinent information. In addition, the intervenors have been consistently outspent by their opponents.

In a period of open cross-examination during a 1977 House Subcommittee hearing on appropriations for the Tennessee Clinch River Breeder Project (since axed), Dr. Frank von Hippel caught Floyd Culler, deputy director of Oak Ridge National Laboratories, relying on an electrical growth projection done by the Edison Electrical Institute. This study predicted that the demand for electricity would increase at a rate of 4.7 percent to the year 2000, as a result of a decrease in its constant-dollar price of 40 percent! A member of the Subcommittee asked, "How can the price of electricity come down?" to which von Hippel replied, "Well, that was our question."

A group Ralph Nader was working with asked the NRC for the emergency evacuation plans for a reactor in South Carolina. The NRC refused to release the plans in part because they were "too complex for the public to understand."

In the August 1978 House Subcommittee hearing on Nuclear Siting and Licensing, Rep. James Weaver, D-Oregon, established that the executive vice-president of Public Service Co. of New Hampshire, David N. Merrill, was using vastly inflated figures in an estimate of how much oil would be saved by building the nuclear power plants scheduled to go on line in New England.

Mr. Merrill assumed that each facility in question would operate with 100 percent of capacity 8,760 hours a year. Dividing by 24, we obtain 365. He assumed all facilities would produce electricity at top design capacity every hour of every day, 365 days a year. The national yearly averages of percentage operating capacities for nuclear powerplants have been, in Mr. Merril's own words, "in the low 60's, I believe."

In the battle of words and ideas over nuclear power, even when it is fairly waged, the forces are badly mismatched. An extended quotation from the testimony of Phillip B. McDonough before the House Siting and Licensing hearings gives an idea of the problem intervenors face when they try to ensure that their view, too will be heard. Mr. McDonough was, at the time, president of the Seacoast Anti-Pollution League.

"For the small, local environmental organization whose main source of funds is $3 to $5 memberships, bake sales and fleamarkets, the protracted sequence of prehearing conference, brief, reply brief, hearing, proposed findings, reply, decision, appeal, more briefs, remanded hearings, prehearing and on and on and on, can only be viewed as an attempt to exhaust any and all opposition.
All other parties have virtually inexhaustible resources..."

The national debate over nuclear energy has, in short, been more of an uneven and often dishonest shouting match, with the balance of political clout, funding, and legal expertise squarely in favor of the utilities and the nuclear industry. This is no way to conduct democracy, or to forge an acceptable public policy. It becomes not only desireable, but vitally necessary to become fully informed.

Preservation of peace a fight for stability

To the Editor:

Last Friday, the Collegian printed Joan McKenzie's report on "Profs' Opinions on Draft," based on her interviews with three members of the faculty. I had the pleasure of being one of them. While the story was, on the whole, accurate, I would like to take exception to a minor stylistic point, and then add a few thoughts on the draft, promised in the headline but not delivered in the text.

According to the story, I committed the stylistic abomination of wishing "Carter had addressed the welfare of the entire world." It so happens that I do not mind addressing envelopes or audiences, but I never address problems, questions, or issues, and don't wish Carter did either. With problems, questions, or issues let us grapple or struggle or deal.

More seriously, concerning the draft, I am, of course, all in favor. Even better would be universal service, with non-military options. As a radical socialist, I see in it the closest practical approximation of the old socialist demand for a "people's militia," for an "armed nation." I find the idea of having this country defended by mercenaries repulsive.

I hear the objection that this is a capitalist class society whose interests are not people's interests, and therefore not worth defending. Not quite. Yes, this is a capitalist society, but it is also, and at the same time, a society. Its interests cannot all be reduced to the interests of the capitalist system, and dismissed as such. Many of our interests transcend the capitalist framework of our society, or have nothing to do with it, and for the sake of these we need armed defenses.

The major interest of our society is the preservation of peace. I share it. Hence, I am in favor of the draft because I am against war. The reasoning is simple. To be against the draft, to let our relative power decline further, is an invitation to further international rapism on the part of Moscow, and eventually to war, once we find ourselves with our back against the wall, and don't want to surrender.

I wish college students understood the simple logic of the link between the draft and their personal safety. If you are afraid of war, nuclear or "conventional," the best you can do is to support our defense capabilities. Why repeat the disastrous mistakes Britain, France, and the United States made 40-45 years ago? By not arming; by saying "Austria, Sudetenland, Bohemia are, after all, in Hitler's sphere of interests" (the way one now speaks of Afghanistan); by not opposing an international bully in time, they made World War II possible and bear responsibility for it.

In one sentence: To serve now, and gladly, will save us having to fight and die later.

Vaclav Holesovsky
Professor of Economics

Opposing registration against 'our interests'

To the Editor:

I can't see why anyone is opposed to registration. It is not the draft and it does not mean that we will have the draft during peace-time. Registration is just keeping the Selective Service up to date on your address.

The main argument against registration, that I have heard, is that it will lead to the draft and war. First of all, a war could happen whether or not we have the draft, and if there is a war, the draft would come back anyway! In this case, we would be months behind because we wouldn't have everyone's addresses. As for not wanting war, who does? I don't want a war and, morally, I couldn't kill anyone if there was one. However, I can participate in other duties in the service of my country, such as helicopter pilot (to bring wounded to medical units), supply personnel, assistant in a medical unit, cook, staff-worker, etc. As I said, I am against war, but who is going to keep the peace, contain Communism, prevent coups, and protect our interests? It must be us and we must be ready—not to start a war, but to show that America won't be pushed around and will help her friends and allies.

Five College's 'Guys & Dolls' is 'refreshing'

By DEBBIE WALLACE
Collegian Staff

Even independent gamblers can be manipulated into romance, especially if they are wooed by the sentimental songs of Frank Loessor's musical fable, "Guys and Dolls."

Review

The funny, fast paced dialogue, coupled with outstanding music and lyrics provide a can't miss formula for an entertianing evening. Despite the many rough edges of this Mount Holyoke winter term production, the Five-College cast of "Guys and Dolls" provided a refreshing escape.

The show is set on the streets of Broadway in the heart of gambler's row, where the inhabitants are searching frantically for a place to carry out official business: Their floating crap game. But, the "heat" is on, courtesy of police Lieutenant Brannigan. It is a boy meets girl tale for one couple. Lesbian Union may close

By TRACY CHAMBERLAIN
Special to the Collegian

Unless something is done, and soon, the UMass Lesbian Union may be closing its door on the ninth floor of the Campus Center for the last time.

There is a general feeling of apathy for the services offered by the Lesbian Union, not only on the part of students, but on the part of the Universiy as a whole, according to Vanessa Place, union spokeswoman.

"Nobody's coming up there anymore," she said.

One reason for the lack of student participatioan is that "the office is rarely open," Place said. "There are no paid positions, and currently there is only one woman staffing the office."

Place also cited the fact that homophobia is a very real problem. "The environment on campus in not conducive to issues pertaining to lesbianism," she added. "There are many women at UMass who don't even know the lesbian Union exists."

There is a need to make the students aware of the services at the Lesbian Union, she said. "L.U. (Lesbian Union), should be made known to the new students during orientation," Place said.

Among the services available at the union are counseling by staff counselors, a lending library, resource center, and drop-in center. Speakers can also be arranged for through the union dormitory functions or classes.

dancer at a local club, the Hot Box. He and his woman, Adelaide, have been engaged for some time; 14 years to be exact.

The Mount Holyoke performance lacked structure. The play was fast paced, but often the actors needed more stage direction. Three of the four leading characters showed both strong stage presence and total asorption with their roles. Sarah, played by Danielle Busch of Mount Holyoke, projected a clear angelic voice which added much to her wholesome character.

Adelaide, palyed by Dorian Ferrari Lerner of Smith College, was also perfectly cast for her role. She portrayed a somewhat brassy, self-assured chorus girl. But she was able to interject a naive, love-lorn quality in the actions.

Nathan Detroit came alive through Peter Tolan of UMass, who milked the part for everything it was worth. His facial expressions and gestures created a humorous and masterfully performed characterization.

Unfortunately, Ian Crabb of Amherst College did not have the voice or acting ability to match his fellow performers.

The other performers were adequate. They blended nicely and were able to sing well as an ensemble. But the minor characters who played Detroit's fellow gamblers had weak singing voices, and little stage presence.

The choreography, by Mount Holyoke's Dolores Jean Dickinson was excellent. Most noteworthy was Jon D. Larson from Amherst who moved effortlessly and with great style, but was not matched by his partner Charles R. Barry of UMass.

The outstanding songs from "Guys and Dolls" will make you leave the theater singing, and this performance was adequate enough to make you glad you attended.

There are better ways to handle a tough semester of math.

Choose the Texas Instruments calculator that's right for your major.

When you're working in a specialized field, you need a specialized calculator. That's why Texas Instruments designed the Slimline Business Analyst-II™ for business and finance . . . and the Slimline TI-50™ for science and math. Each provides the tailored power and the reliability you'll need as you learn to solve the problems you'll face as a professional. And each has a price you'll appreciate as a student.

Slimline* Business Analyst-II. Sleek LCD calculator with versatile business capabilities.

Solving financial problems with the Slimline Business Analyst-II can make working with your old calculator seem like pencil-and-paper arithmetic. The functions required to perform many common business, financial and statistical calculations are built in to help you make quick, accurate evaluations of many complex business situations.

Special financial keys are used to handle time and money problems such as compound interest, annuity payments, mortgage loans, investment yields, amortization schedules and more.

Statistical and linear regression capabilities provide the power you'll need to boil down data and automatically handle problems such as sales and earnings forecasts.

Profit margin calculations concerning cost, selling price and margin can be performed rapidly when any two of the variables are known. Other features include a four-function data register with Constant Memory™ feature that retains its contents even when the calculator is turned off. Two miniature batteries provide up to two years of operation in normal use. And TI's APD™ automatic power down feature helps prevent accidental battery drain.

The Business Analyst-II, with detailed owner's manual and suede-look vinyl wallet with pockets for notes, $45.00*.

The Slimline TI-50 packs 60 powerful functions into a handsome, compact package.

The pocket-portable Slimline TI-50 is a remarkably powerful LCD slide-rule calculator. Yet it's as thin as a pencil and weighs only three ounces!

Its 60 versatile functions can help you handle a wide range of college math problems. Capabilities include common and natural logarithms. Six trigonometric operations that can be performed in three angular modes (degrees, radians or grads). Two constant memories that retain their contents even when the calculator is turned off. And more.

Seven built-in statistical functions simplify the task of boiling down large sets of data points so you can perform accurate analyses and draw reliable conclusions.

The power of the Slimline TI-50 is made easy to use by TI's AOS™ algebraic operating system, which provides 15 sets of parentheses and accepts up to four pending operations. That means you can enter most problems just as they're written, left to right.

Two miniature batteries provide up to two years of normal operation. And TI's APD™ automatic power down feature helps prevent accidental battery drain.

The Slimline TI-50 includes a detailed owner's manual and a durable vinyl wallet, $40.00*.

Make sure your next calculator has the specialized power to handle the problems unique to your major. See the Business Analyst-II and the Slimline TI-50 at your college bookstore or other TI dealer today.

OK, it's only one win, but it's Wilson's first

By DAVE BRADLEY
Collegian Staff

Twenty-six losses in a row, twenty-seven, twenty-eight, twenty-nine...VICTORY! The first one in 30 games—a 67-44 win Saturday over Harvard University in the Colonial Classic. Hallelujah!

The men's basketball team had had enough. Like Popeye being bullied too much by Brutus, the Minutemen had taken all they could, they couldn't stands no more. The made The Streak history and first-year Head Coach Ray Wilson had his first win in the collegiate ranks.

"I think I was more happy for the kids," the coach said yesterday, "because I got an idea of what they've been through and also how hard they worked." They'd been "knocked down so often...but they got back up again. That," the coach said, was "most gratifying."

Wilson said he knew the team had iced the victory "with about a minute to go. I couldn't figure out how they (Harvard) were gonna overcome, whatever it was, 18 or 16..."

Four-year assistant coach Ray Ricketts was confident of the win a little sooner than Wilson. "It didn't settle in until like three minutes left in the game," he said. "It feels great, like a monkey off your back."

The monkey, that is The Streak, began last year under coach Jack Leaman when the Minutemen dropped their last 13 games. The margins of defeat started off low but increased into the tens and twenties before season's end.

The deficits continued this year to be in the 10 point and over range with the exceptions of Bentley College, Harvard (the first time), American International College, Rutgers University and the University of Rhode Island. These games, Wilson feels, could have been Streak stoppers had the rebounding and scoring statistics been a little higher for UMass.

But Wilson noted: "I think there are some situations that I can take a whole lot of blame for. I think prior to Harvard I had been working the team so hard" that the effort became counter productive.

Did he lighten up?

"Maybe I smartened up," he said.

Wilson never really worried about The Streak, he said, and he wasn't even aware of it until a media person told him the number was at 17.

Both Wilson and Ricketts feel the team won Saturday because the players meshed as a cohesive unit. Now it's time to repeat the effort.

"They know what it feels like to win," Ricketts said, "and they like that feeling."

Hallelujah.

Spikers win 3, lose 3 at weekend jamboree

By MAUREEN SULLIVAN
Collegian Staff

The men's varsity volleyball team compiled a 3-3 record last Sunday at the New England Collegiate Volleyball League Division One Jamboree at Durham, New Hampshire.

Playing six one-game matches to 15 points or 20 minutes (whichever came first), UMass downed Northeastern 15-8, lost to Boston University 6-8, were downed by Rhode Island 12-13, fell to NECVL defending champion Harvard 9-13, overwhelmed MIT 15-5, and defeated host UNH 15-9.

While play was good overall, UMass had problems with their serve; according to Coach Al Morel, the team missed at least two serves per game. "Our serving was off," he said, "and against teams like these, that's not good."

Quique Caballero and Jim Grosslein were among the standout for UMass,; while Caballero hit and passed very well, Grosslein helped to keep the defense going with his blocking at the net.

Despite the less-than-notable starts for the varsity and JVs (who went 0-for-6 at their Jamboree last Saturday at NOPE), Morel feels confident for the upcoming season.

"We used the Jamborees to feel out the other teams and get in some playing time," he said, "What we did doesn't count on our record. Overall, we are in good shape physically, and we've been practicing serve reception and setting since week one. We'll be speeding up our offense considerably for our games against Yale this Thursday and against Northeastern and Harvard this coming Saturday here at UMass.

The match against Yale University is at New Haven Thursday evening. The team is not funded by the Athletic department, and is a Recognized Student Organization. It raises its own funds, and according to Morel, does well at it.

One of the highlights of the season will come Feb. 25 when the team hosts Penn State. The Nittany Lions are the top team in the East and third in the nation, accoring to Morel.

The Hartford Civic Center Coliseum is scheduled to open this week. Cranes here finish up the reconstruction of the building which collapsed under snow just hours after UConn had defeated UMass in basketball on Jan. 18, 1978. (AP Laserphoto)

Runners place at relays

By JANE WOLFSON
Collegian Staff

Placing seventh in the mile relay and sixth in the championship distance medley were the results of the members of the UMass indoor track team who traveled to Princeton NJ to take part in the ninth annual Princeton Relays.

The mile relay team, which placed seventh out of 40 teams, finished at 3:23. Running the first leg was senior tri-captain Mickey Baugh at 50.6. He was followed by junior Bob Pearson who ran a 51.7 quarter. Running the fastest split in the relay was junior tri-captain Rick Trunfio at 50.1. The anchor leg was run by an injured Rick Cady who still ran an impressive 50.9.

Running the leadoff leg for the distance medley was tri-captain Steve MacDougall who ran the half mile at 1:55.4. Trunfio again ran the quarter mile with a time of 50.2.

Senior Rick Walls ran 3:02.5 in the three quarter of a mile leg and sophomore Paul Beaulieu ran the anchor mile at 4:12.8. UMass' overall time was 10:01.3.

Overall the distance medley was won by Penn State with a time of 9:48, that time qualifying them for the Nationals to be held in March at Detroit.

Trackwomen lose twice

By JIM GRAHAM
Collegian Staff

The UMass women's indoor track team was defeated last Saturday by URI 55—25 and by UConn 50—25 in a meet held on the boards of URI's indoor track. With only 17 Minutewomen competing in the tri—meet, the team managed to score with some top performances in individual events.

Freshman Angie Caouette proved to be a top scorer for the Minutewomen by placing fourth in the 50 yard dash in 6.4 and second in the long jump with a leap of 16'8". It was Caouvette's first time ever competing in the long jump. Sophomore Micki Callahan finished fourth in the long jump with a leap of 16'6" and came in sixth in the 50 yard hurdles with a time of 7.4.

Others who competed in the field events were freshman Diane Boczanowski who threw the shot 30'1" and Julie Horgan who high jumped 4'10".

In the middle distance events the Minutewomen fared well with three of their best distance women placing in both the half—mile and quarter—mile. Dianne Sealey won the quarter—mile with a time of 61 seconds. In the half—mile sophomore Judy McCrone placed second in 2:22 and captain Karolyn Shea placed fifth in 2:26. "I'm doing the half—mile and relays mainly to improve my speed," said McCrone, who usually runs the mile or two—mile.

The women picked up two third places in both the mile and the two—mile. Sophomore Julie Burke ran the mile in 5:09 with sophomore Tricia Moores finishing in 11:27 in the two—mile in a close race with runners from both URI and U Conn. Over intersession the women's track team lost four of its best runners in the distance events. "Intersession hurt us and we lost some of our depth, but we're starting to get stronger and better talent for the spring season," Coach Arnie Morse said.

"We won't be quite as strong as we were in the distance events. In this meet the jumpers and sprinters were the ones who seemed to do well," captain and middle distance runner Karolyn Shea said.

There were only 17 Minutewomen at Saturday's meet at URI and Coach Arnie Morse said that he expected to take at least 28 women to next Sunday's meet at UVM. "Right now I'm more concerned that the women get used to competing than with pushing for peak performances," Coach Morse said. Cyndi Martin and Carolyn Gardner, two of UMass's best middle distance runners who were absent from the URI meet, are expected to compete in next Sunday's meet.

Over 500 hit open hearing to forestall utilities hike

By MICHAEL SILVA
Collegian Staff

SPRINGFIELD—More than 500 persons—elderly, Amherst-area students, politicians and residents from throughout Western Massachusetts—travelled here to a public hearing last night to protest a proposal to increase utility rates.

The turnout for the public session, which lasted more than two-and-one-half hours, was so large it forced the meeting to be moved from the city council chambers in city hall to a room in the Springfield Civic Center.

At least 20 persons testified against the hike. No one testified in favor of the hike, and officials from the utility company, WMECO, declined to comment.

"The policy of WMECO leading to the rate increase request before you is a bad public policy and a bad social policy," Amherst state Sen. John W. Olver told the three-member board which heard the testimony. "It is my recommendation that you reject virtually the whole of this rate increase," the Amherst Democrat testified amidst applause from the audience.

State Rep. James G. Collins, D-Amherst, who was not present, submitted a letter which also protested the proposed increase.

The hike would mean at least a $5 monthly increase for the average residential consumer of electricity in Western Massachusetts. The increase also would bill residential users more than industrial users. The total increase would mean an additional $27.88 million for WMECO.

Another person who testified said the "father" of electricity—Ben Franklin—would tell WMECO "to go fly a kite" if he were alive today.

UMass senior Beth Elliott, who attended but did not testify, said the proposed rate increase is base on "pure speculation" and "greed."

Protest signs were carried by some persons and before the meeting commenced the audience chanted, "one, two, three, four, we won't pay you any more" and "two, four, six, eight, we won't let you raise your rate."

Television crews were allowed to film the room before the meeting began, but were prohibited from filming the session because it was a "quasi-courtroom" hearing, officials said. The three board members stopped the meeting for 15 minutes until TV crews left.

Amherst Town Manager A. Louis Hayward also testified, and said the rate increases would force tuition at area colleges to rise.

SGA, Field hurl charges over policies

By DAVID KELLOGG
Special to the Collegian

The UMass administration has vowed to clean up alleged misconduct in the student government, said Dean of Students William C. Field, who emphasized that he is not out for any individual's blood, but is serious about changing what he called a "corrupt system."

"I have not brought any charges against any individuals and do not plan to," he said. "The responsibility for reform lies with the Student Government Association and the administration jointly."

Charges of corruption made by Field were sharply refuted by SGA co-Presidents Brian Burke and Rich LaVoice.

"Let me see the proof of all that corruption," said LaVoice. "His accusations are outrageous."

The two claimed that the administration, particularly Field, is distorting facts to undermine student unity.

"At this point we are going to have to take it with a grain of salt," said Burke. "There's more to this than there appears to be."

At the center of the controversy are administration charges of nepotism and favoritism in SGA hiring. Dean Field criticized the hiring of student senators for Student Center for Education, Research and Advocacy jobs.

"Whenever the people who vote the money for organizations can be hired by them, there's a problem," he said.

Selection committees were criticized for violating the university's affirmative action policies. Field mentioned recent searches for the director and assistant director of the Student Activites Office which turned up only white, male candidates.

"We are more committed to affirmative action than the administration," said LaVoice.

Field also claims that a student majority on these committees is voting as a block, hiring people they already know, and hiring people without a real knowledge of their abilities. A more effective alternative, he said, would be a student civil service examination rating against known standards. He also suggested formal orientation for selection committees

Reagan brushes off old age worries

Touring New Hampshire yesterday on the eve of his 69th birthday, Ronald Reagan boasted that his age is an asset and that debate among the GOP presidential rivals would help voters determine "where we differ."

As if to demonstrate his resilience, Reagan criss-crossed the state by bus, darted into the streets to greet the people and showed no hesitation to talk about his age.

"The question is, 'Would my age be a factor against me in the campaign?' " Reagan told a Plaistow, N.H., high school audience. "I don't think the number of years are very important as long as you retain your faculties, your physical abilites and so forth. I think I have."

Gunman holds 7 at U.S. company

MILAN, Italy (AP) — A lone gunman broke into the Milan office of a U.S. subsidiary yesterday, killed one employee and was holding seven persons hostage, police sources reported.

Reinforced by sharpshooters and police dogs, heavily armed riot policemen clad in bulletproof vests ringed the offices of Ralston Purina Italia, a subsidiary of Ralston Purina Co. of St. Louis, Mo.

The police sources said five of the hostages were women employees. One of them told a reporter on the phone that the man had killed one employee. She did not give any other details.

Double revolt hits El Salvador junta

SAN SALVADOR, El Salvador (AP) — High school students occupied the Education Ministry and left-wing militants seized the Spanish Embassy yesterday in a double-barreled challenge to the beleaguered military-civilian junta.

No casualties were reported, but officials said some of the 20 militants who invaded the Spanish Embassy were armed and had taken nine hostages, including Ambassador Victor Sanchez Meza.

The leftists reportedly were demanding four jailed comrades be released and Spain sever diplomatic relations with El Salvador.

Reporter sneaks in at 3 Mile Island

HARRISBURG, PA. (AP)—A reporter who got himself hired as a guard at the Three Mile Island nuclear plant later gained entry thorugh an unlocked door to the sensitive control room, his newspaper reported yesterday in an article the plant's operators tried to suppress.

The Guide, a muckraking Harrisburg area weekly, printed copyright stories about the exploits of cub reporter Robert Kapler following a court battle in which Metropolitan Edison Co. tried to block publication.

"TMI: it's a Paradise Island for the saboteur," said one headline. "I waltz into unlocked control room of Unit 2," said another.

New details discovered in N.Mexico riot

By S.J. GUFFEY
Associated Press

SANTA FE, N.M. (AP) —While more bodies were hunted in the still-smouldering ruins of the New Mexico State Penitentiary, a state official said yesterday many prisoners risked their lives to save hostages from the horrible atrocities inflicted on some inmates.

Furthermore, Felix Rodriguez, deputy secretary of criminal justice, said many of the convicts trapped in the weekend rioting should not have been there in the first place.

After revising the death count several times, officials said Tuesday at least 36 inmates died — some of overdoses of drugs — in the 36-hour reign of terror, the most savage prison riot of modern times in this country. Thirty-nine had been reported dead at one time.

Inmates said a convict execution squad armed with blowtorches and axes killed some prisoners in a cellblock that held men identified as informants.

The murders, beheadings, torture and mutiliations ended when state police and National Guardsmen moved in Sunday afternoon.

Warden Jerry Griffin placed the death toll at 33 Tuesday, but three other officials said 36 were confirmed dead. Gov. Bruce King's press secretary, Jill Marron, said Griffin's total did not include three bodies found in the burned-out gymnasium.

Griffin said a team of anthropologists would sift through the burned-out gym, which inmates said had been used as a torture chamber, seeking more remains.

Dr. James Weston, state medical examiner, said some of the 33 bodies examined by his staff had been mutilated, but he could not determine scientifically whether inmates had been tortured.

"Some had injuries suggesting torture, but nothing you could check with a microscope," he said at a news conference in Albuquerque.

Weston confirmed that one inmate had been decapitated and that another arrived with a rod through his head. He said he thought both incidents occurred after death.

Congress corruption evidence may be withheld

By JIM ADAMS
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Attorney General Benjamin Civiletti met with House leaders yesterday and indicated his department will oppose giving evidence in the FBI's political corruption probe to congressional investigators.

Civiletti proposed the meeting with congressional leaders concerned about the FBI investigation, in which eight members of Congress have been implicated.

Following the session, the attorney general said he had told the congressmen that the Justice Department will present to the House ethics committee today "the position of the department on preserving the integrity of the investigation and ... the role of the ethics committee."

Asked three times if that meant he will refuse to turn over videotapes and other evidence implicating congressmen, Civiletti replied: "I will make no further comment."

But Justice Department officials said they traditionally have negotiated with committees to brief them on cases but have declined to turn over documents and other evidence until the criminal cases are closed.

Civiletti said Philip Heymann, assistant attorney general in charge of the department's criminal division, will present the Justice Department's position to the House Ethics Committee this morning. The statement might be given in public.

On Monday, ethics committees of both the House and Senate met to discuss reports that members of Congress were implicated in the FBI investigation. The chairman of the Senate ethics panel informally asked Civiletti for Justice Department help with its own investigation.

The Senate panel met again yesterday and its chairman, Sen. Howell Heflin, D-Ala., said he hoped committee members would receive a briefing from Justice Department officials.

Before Civiletti's meeting with House members, Heflin quoted the attorney general as saying it was possible that congressional and Justice Department investigations could be conducted simultaneously.

But late in the day, Heflin said he had no word on whether the Justice Department would cooperate with an investigation by the Senate committee.

Mass. Press Association collapses after 2 years from member apathy

By DEBBIE COHEN
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts Press Association, a branch of the National Federation of Press Women, succumbed to a lack of interest among it members and folded last week.

According to UMass graduate Irmarie Jones, a columnist at The Greenfield Reporter, and a member of the defunct organization, the group began on too large a scale to succeed.

"We should have started small," she said. "Instead, we got going in a grandiose way and it was too much. People just lost interest."

The purpose of the group, Jones said, had been to meet semi-annually to discuss problems, goals and issues common to people in the media. Jones said there were too many guest speakers, however, and not enough discussion of mutual problems.

"We were hoping that it would improve and tone our skills," Jones said. "I think it's really good to find out that you're not the only one having certain problems."

The association was organized in the Campus Center at UMass in August 1978. The charter included about 30 to 40 members, of whom approximately one-third were men.

The group was the state's first branch of the National Federal of Press Women, which also admits men. "We thought that it was really something to start a group like this in Western Massachusetts, rather than in Boston," she said.

Jones said that as far as she knows, the Mass. Press Assoc. charter still exists. "Perhaps we'll be able to organize informal weekday noon luncheons where we can all get together to talk over mutual concerns," she said.

Sasha Nanus, professional mime/actress, explores "The Human Experience Through Mime" Wednesday, Feb. 6 at 8:00 p.m. in Herter Hall 231, UMass.

The public is invited to this free performance, sponsored by UMass B'nai B'rith Hillel, Governor's Program Council, and 5-College Hillel as one of a series of events in the 5-College Jewish Arts Festival, which begins today and runs until March 6.

Arts Council to continue foreign films

The UMass Arts Council will open the 1980's with a semester dedicated to the fine arts of film and dance. The semester begins with the continuation of the Soviet and Eastern European film series.

This semster's film festival opens on February 27 with Walkover, Jerry Skolimowski's autobiographical film about a boxing hustler traveling around Poland. The series continues on March 12 with Piosmani, a visual meditation on the life of the primitive Georgian artist Niko Pirsmanashvili. The series will conclude on April 2 with A Report on the Party and the Guests, banned several times, recently forever. This Czechoslovakian film is one of the most potent allegories on totalitarianism of our time. All the films in this series are scheduled for Wednesday nights at 8 p.m., and will be held in Thompson Hall, room 106. Admission is free.

The Council is proud to co-sponsor, along with the Black Mass Communication Project, the Campus Center Program Committee, the Undergraduate Student Senate, and the Black History Month Coordinating Committee, Black Shadows on a Silver Screen, an all day festival on the black experience in films. The festival starts at noon Thursday and concludes at midnight that day. All films will be shown in the Student Union Ballroom and admission is free.

Also coming this spring, March 11 the Royal Dancers and Musicians from the Kingdom of Bhutan will make their debut performance at UMass. This show is sponsored by the Council and the Asia Society's Performing Arts Program. The troupe of 13 dancers and musicians will travel to 24 cities and campuses throughout the United States. Ticket prices for this performance are $2, general public; UMass students free with I.D.; all other students, $1. Tickets can be purchased at the Fine Arts Center Box Office and will go on sale Feb. 26.

More couples decide not to have kids

By DENISE FORMLEY
Collegian Staff

Recently much attention has been focused on alternative lifestyles, including childless marriages. Economic factors, women in the work force, and traditional views of family structure have changed drastically within the last generation. As a result of these changes, many people are re-evaluating the importance of having children.

A study done at the University of Michigan and reported in the August 1979 issue of "USA Today," indicated the most common disadvantage of having children is the loss of freedom. According to American parents questioned in the study, many people are putting a new value on personal freedom in career goals and lifestyles. Traditionallly, children were considered the focal point of a marriage, but this is reportedly changing. Many couples surveyed said, that if they decide to have children, they will continue their careers as well.

Other issues that may delay the decision to have children include confidence that the marriage will be long lasting, increased mobility in achieving career goals, and the rapidly rising cost of raising children. A study published in the March 5, 1979 issue of "Time" indicated that, on the average, it now costs $100,00 to raise a child.

The "USA Today" article stated that respondents to a 1977 survey looked more favorably on couples who have chosen not to have children than did those in a similar survey done in 1957. An important shift in attitudes has taken a great deal of societal pressure off childless couples.

Judy Li, a UMass graduate student in Accounting, plans on having a family, but not until she and her husband are established in their carrers. She feels that children are a special part of a marriage, but said she will continue her career while raising her family. She feels strongly that attitudes have changed in favor of childless couples,

A long forgotten ideal called education....

Hidden under all of this hustle and bustle, crushed under all the pressure to pick a major and graduate, is a long forgotten ideal called education.

Once we have loaded down our schedules with core requirements and introductory courses to our majors we find that we have 15 credits and no free time.

We as students agree that most of us are here to get a degree, improve our chances in the job market, and increase our social standings. These goals, however are only part of the process of education.

We in particular as Third world and minority students have an obligation to extend ourselves beyond the usual University requirements. It is sad but true that in today's university one can get what is supposedly a well rounded education and still ahve little or no knowledge of various cultures that exist right here in America. One can be granted a Bachelor of Science or a Bachelor of Arts in any field from Anthropology to Home Economics and still have a very limited and one sided view of American history.

Political views and ideas that are very much a part of our life and society are not core requirements. Issues such as racism, sexism, and discrimination, while available for those of us who want to take the, are not mandatory for those who need to take them.

I am not advocating a new core system in this piece. That would be another editorial. What I want to do is remind the students for which this news service is intended advantage of the gifts of culture which surround us while we are here at the university.

Take a night from you accounting, your economics and your rhetoric to see an African dance troupe or to attend a lecture about your heritage. Make room in that busy schedule for an Afrom Am course that will answer those questions that History 110 left hanging.

Visit the art exhibits that tell your history in images that cannot convey. Turn down the disco on your stereo long enough to hear and feel the pain and pride only to be found in Black classical, Latino or other reflective cultural forms of music.

If you do not recognize and take advantage of the programs that are available to you now, those who enter as freshmen after you will not have the same opportunities. Their college days will be filled with issues that are irrelevant to our existence and programs which ignore the cultural contributions of our societies.

It is up to us to make our education complete. We must be the one to fill the gaps left by the core requirements. We must be the onew to support the artists that have grown from our communities. If we pass through four years at this university without tasting from these fruits than we are truly deprived and we have no one to blame but ourselves.

Our Hidden History The Key to Freedom

Last night in the New Africa House the small group of people who attended the slide and lecture presentation entitled "Black History, Black Rage", were informed and enlighted by Third World coordinator and campus activist Tony Craton.

The lecture itself was carried out in an informal tone as Craton tried to convey to his audience the serious mutilation that Black history has undergone.

Reaching as far back as Ancient Africa he tried to set right some of the facts of Black heritage that have been consistently and conscientously misrepresented.

"We have been through a very devastating experience," he said. "I don't think we realize just how devastating it was." We don't know just how devastating it was because the history that could teach that to us has been denied us.

Craton told his audience, "It is not enough to know that you are of African Descent. What do you really know?" Then he set out to show us through his slides of Egyptian and African art and culture just what it means to be of African descent.

He spoke of the Pyramid age when the Pharoes ruled. He spoke of ancient civilizations, more advanced than anything we can concieve of today. He spoke of unity, of beauty and of the logic and intelligence of man and nature combined.

He spoke of the accomplishments of welding and human surgery that were originated by Black people but whose credit has since been stolen and attributed to another race of people.

The religions that we recognize today were outgrowths of African and Egyptian worship, yet those religions were labeled pagan and we are deceived into believing that we were the savages of those early ages.

Craton's lecture only touch the beginnings of a project that is long overdue for many who did not bother to attend. We cannot begin to change our present situation until we understand fully the past from which we have evolved.

Craton himself put it well when he said, "Our history will teach us how to deal with the politics of today."

Queen Mother Moore to speak at CC

Queen Mother Moore will be speaking from 4-5 pm on Feb. 7 in the Campus Center on political repression sponsored by the Third World Women's Task Force in cooperation with Black History Month. Queen Mother Moore, whose slave name is Audley Moore, was born in the backwoods of Louisiana in 1998. Today, at the age of 82, she is still one of the foremost spokespersons for the rights of Blacks in the United States

With no formal education past the third grade, Queen Mother Moore is self-taught and considered to be a storehouse of knowledge on African history. She became greatly influenced in 1919 when she heard Marcus Garcey speak at a rally. Her sister, Eloise Moore, an elder to Malcolm X, also greatly influenced her.

In 1970, Public School 68 in New York City was renamed in honor of Eloise Moore.

Queen Mother Moore has founded several organizations including the Universal Association of Ethiopian Women and Mt. Addis Ababa which is an educational and cultural center located in New York.

Queen Mother now resides in New York City, her home has been set afire and also the Queen Mother Moore Institute for Treatment of Oppression Psychoanalysis was also set afire.

Ombudsman makes link for students, bureaucracy

By MICHAEL MANNING
Special to the Collegian

Most UMass students are painfully aware of the hazards involved in dealing with UMass red tape, but many are unaware that there is a UMass official designated to handle disputes between students, faculty, and administrators.

Who and where is this answer to all questions? He is the ombudsman and his office is located on the eighth floor of the Campus Center. Acting as an advisor, the ombudsman can publish what he or she feels are fair resolutions to any dispute that can arise in a University setting.

The office was created ten years ago by an act of the University Trustees in response to an act passed by the Faculty Senate requesting an autonomous and independent position to resolve conflicts. To ensure vigorous action on the part of the ombudsman, the position can only be filled by one person for a maximum of four years. The ombudsman is appointed by a selection committee for two years and has the option (upon favorable evaluation) of retaining the office for an additional two year term.

Since the creation of the office in 1970, the position has been held only be tenured faculty members. However, the job description states that students are eligible for the office.

A selection process has started this semester to replace Acting Ombudsman Severt J. Savereid. The members of the search committee include Dean of Students William Field, faculty representatives John to give them a better idea of what skills a job requires.

★ Field, SGA

Field expressed regrets that his criticisms are seen as moving in on student government sovereignty. "I do not think that I want anything different for this campus than the average student wants."

But Dean Field apparently has a vision for UMass that differs sharply from that of Burke and LaVoice.

"He does not want to see students in charge of their lives," LaVoice said. "He does not want a strong student government."

Recently, Field attacked the student government budget. Several million dollars a year passes through SGA accounts, coming largely from the $84 per student per year Student Activities Tax Fund fee, and funds the many Recognized Student Organizations. This money, which Field emphasizes belongs to the students, is controlled by the Undergraduate Student Senate.

Last year's budget deficit of about $180,000 was partly a matter of bad handling, Field said. One solution is to bring in outside auditors and put SGA accounts on the University computer, he added.

Burke and LaVoice are resolved to oppose administration attempts to bring the SGA budget under University accounting. They explained that SGA operation is different from that of the University, and needs a more flexible system.

"The Trustees recognize that the student government is not being dealt with fairly," LaVoice said, pointing to a December 1979 decision by the Board of Trustees to bring in outside accountants to design a better system for the SGA possibly independent of the University.

"Some people are fighting hard to prevent progress," Field charged, "they are clearly afraid the university will take them over. Still, a lot of people in the student government want to help. The Student Senate will have to sit down with the administration."

Field criticized what he sees as an undesirable love of power in the student government's "insane" reaction to his charges. LaVoice "wants to be elevated to sainthood," he said.

"I have a love of students controlling their own destiny." LaVoice responded, "If he is going to attack me, I am going to fight twice as hard."

Editorial/Opinion

Middle-age for a strong America

It seems that recently everybody has been giving their opinion about whether or not there should be a draft, and if so, who should be drafted and all that. But the solution that appears the most obvious to me hasn't even been mentioned.

I believe in a strong America, ready with military force to fight for what we all believe in. I believe that we should immediately reinstate the draft and get the war machine ready, but with one major difference from all of the other proposals.

JACKSON KATZ

I really think that America's interests would be much better served by drafting middle-aged to older white men instead of 18-26-year olds of both sexes.

Now I know that a lot of people won't take this seriously, and I'm sure some people will think I'm just venting my anger on these guys out of a sense of frustration or something. But that's really not the case. I honestly believe that this would be best for the people of America, and that's what this whole draft thing is supposed to be about. There are a number of reasons why I feel this way.

First of all, being middle-aged and older, most of them have lived a fairly long life, and if they died it wouldn't be a great tragedy. Secondly, being older and probably wiser, they could make up for their physical inferiority with their intellectual superiority. A smart fighter is a good fighter, you know. Related to this, older men wouldn't be as likely to engage in such escapist activities as alcohol and drug use, and consequently would be better, more disciplined soldiers.

In addition, these soldiers should be white, so people couldn't complain that minorities take the brunt of the suffering and sacrifice in wars; and they would be men, so that feminists couldn't argue that women were again the victims of "oppressive patriarchy."

But more importantly than all of this, the older and wealthier, especially people in government, would know exactly what they were fighting and dying for. They wouldn't be as likely to be swept up in the tide of blind, unquestioning patriotism that young people looking for their role in society are so apt to do. Instead, they would be fighting a clear battle with tangible aims. They would have a real reason for fighting, and this would make them even more effective.

And men in Congress and government who have come out in favor of the draft would make especially good soldiers for the American cause. They could prove that the things they claim are necessary to fight for are really worth sacrificing lives for, by actually fighting and dying. And this would be the strongest form of true representation possible! Seeing the applause President Carter got when he mentioned he wanted to begin draft registration in his State of the Union Address and, seeing the number of legislators who have come out in support of the draft, it's clear that these men have the necessary enthusiasm to ably serve our country. I could go on...

Finally, the American people's basic mistrust of the government—what President Carter called the "crisis of confidence"—would be significantly diminished.

I'm sure I'd have more confidence in the fact that our government acts in the best interests of all the people if I were, say, riding in my Cadillac and watching the six o'clock news, seeing John Connally at the airport in a wheelchair because he lost his legs in a shrapnel explosion in some desert outpost, and seeing Chip, Jack, Rosalynn, Miss Lillian and little Amy sobbing, overcome with grief as President Carter's body was lowered from the military transport aircraft.

The opportunity of a lifetime

DEBORAH WAYNE

With the probability of attending the Moscow Summer Olympics diminishing with every press conference, the possibility of having an alternative Olympic games for our athletes is becoming inevitable. The rationale is that the talent of these fine athletes should not go unnoticed or unrewarded, creating the problems of where to hold the events, and what events to have.

It has just been disclosed that Chancellor Henry Koffler has offered the UMass/Amherst campus as the site for these alternative games. The beauty of this proposal is that little money has to be spent in preparing for the historic event. Athletes will be housed in the Campus Center Hotel, surrounding fraternities and sororities, and the swing spaces in Southwest. Nutritious meals will be provided by Worcester Dining Commons. And, of course, all the athletic facilities we could possibly need already exist right here.

The events are scheduled for April 8-22, but in case you can't get to the games, Channel 22 has bought the rights to telecast the proceedings. Here are just some of the events our amateur athletes will be competing in:

200 Meter Dash—Athletes must run the distance between the Blue Wall and the Hatch while students are changing classes. Enthusiasts are hoping that the four minute barrier will at last be broken.

Pinball—A new Olympic event, athletes are judged on finesse, skill, and total points, assuming, of course, that they can wait long enough to get to a machine.

The Whitmore Paper Chase—Athletes attempt to drop Econ 104 two months after add-drop period.

Basketball—The American team will face the UMass men's team. The Olympiads are expected to win easily.

The Bicycle Race—Our Olympic cyclists attempt a course going down North Pleasant Street while avoiding runaway PVTA buses.

The 100 Meter Hurdles—Athletes hurdle over bales of hay under the library.

Survival Test—Contestants are trapped on the 22nd floor of Washington tower for a weekend with nothing but two earplugs and a Pub mug. The only way to make an early exit is down.

The Price-Is-Right—Athletes guess the in-state tuition for next semester. Governor King will judge the event.

The Pentathlon—This year the five events will include swimming the length of the campus pond, skateboarding, the frisbee throw, the Cosmic Wimpout tournament, and the Pub mug chug-a-lug contest. The winner gets to sponsor Whole Wheat Pizza "Dinner of Champions" for the next four years.

The Radio Junkie—First athlete who can name three dj's at WMUA wins.

The Annie Hauler Free-For-All Brawl—Obvious, no? Ten points for each bus the athlete can fight his or her way on to; three points off for each bruise obtained in the process.

Blue Wall Pick-Up Intramurals—This event will be done in tag team fashion. Howard Cosell will provide the blow-by-blow from barside.

The Campus Center Check Cashing Crash—Athletes attempt to cash a personal check on a Friday.

The Veggie Event—They wouldn't be alternative games without one. Blindfolded, our brave athletes are led into Earthfoods and attempt to guess what they are eating. Most correct guesses wins the alternative gold medal (granola), although creativity adds carob brownie points.

The Marathon—Those competing in this event race three times around the outer boundaries of this scenic campus wearing hiking boots and a backpack full of chemistry books.

The 1 a.m. Curfew—Our Olympiad guests attempt to avoid arrest by campus police for lurking around campus after 1 a.m. without an I.D. This is expected to be one of the easier events.

Sorry, but classes will not be suspended during the games. Tickets are going fast and can be bought at the FAC box office, TIX, and all Ticketron outlets.

WFCR changes priorities

TOM ANDERSON

Those students who followed area papers during intersession may be aware of the controversy surrounding foreign language programming on WFCR, the public radio station located on campus. Briefly, the situation is as follows.

After assuming the position of General Manager in November of last year, Robert Goldfarb wrote a memo to the station's staff and its governing body, the Western Massachusetts Broadcasting Council. He outlined numerous ideas for programming changes, among them the possible eliminationor reduction of two foreign language programs, Que Tal Amigos? and Tout En Francais.

These suggestions immediately began a controversy over the role of foreign language programming in public radio. Supporters of the two programs wrote and called the station, and a group of protesters rallied in support of Que Tal Amigos? at WFCR's open house in January. Last Friday, after consultation with staff and listeners, Goldfarb issued a list of changes in the station's program schedule, effective March 31.

Chief among these were two decisions: A strengthened commitment to jazz and folk music, and a reduction in hours and change in time for Que Tal Amigos? The program is currently run on weekday evenings from 7:30 to 8:30 and Saturday evenings from 7:00 to 8:00. Its new slot will be Tuesday and Thursday evenings at 11:00.

It's likely that supporters will not be at all pleased with this change. Que Tal producer Sonia Vivas says the time is too late for her audience of "students, workers, and children." She views the new time as a step toward the total elimination of Spanish programming at the station.

The French program Tout En Francais has been consolidated from two half-hour programs per week to an hour-long slot Sundays at 6:00 p.m. Goldfarb says he feels that this format will allow the program to strengthen its "cultural and educational elements," a direction he is also advocating for Que Tal Amigos?

The whole controversy surrounding these changes raises several questions about the role public radio should play in promoting various cultures. Goldfarb's position is that public radio exists to educate and therefore a program in English presenting a foreign culture is preferable to one entirely in a foreign language, since listeners who do not speak the language will not be excluded. On the other side, Vivas holds that the service provided by foreign language programs to their communities is the most important factor to be considered. Although the majority of WFCR's listeners apparently dislike the prime-time slot of Que Tal Amigos?, Vivas says that the current time is the best for her audience.

Other factors have contributed to the issue. Julio Torres, co-producer of Que Tal Amigos? with Sonia Vivas, resigned in December, citing the uncertainty of the program's future as a major reason. Jazz announcer Jose Tolson also resigned over differences with Goldfarb's proposals for program changes. The only remaining minority employee, Vivas herself, is leaving in June. Goldfarb's current plans call for the continuation of Que Tal Amigos? with an advisory panel of community members, such as now produces Tout En Francais.

The issue here is not at all simple. Charges of "racism" and "elitism" have been flying around, but it is clear that both sides have their merits. Public radio is intended to be an alternative to commercial broadcasting, and there is a certain element of danger when pressure from the majority of a station's listeners can help to reduce or eliminate specialty programming.

On the other hand, public broadcasting is supposed to be educational, and there are some inherent contradictions in a program which of neccessity excludes those who don't already know the language and understand the culture.

Goldfarb has stated that public response has convinced him that foreign language programming is here to stay on WFCR. Given this, what remains to be resolved are the questions of how much and at what time. Stay tuned to 88.5 FM to find out the answers.

Correction

The following is an attempt to clarify the Hyde amendment, referred to in Debbie Wallace's editorial of Friday, Feb. 1.

Rep. Henry Hyde, R-New York introduced legislation which bans the use of Medicaid funds for abortions unless the mother's life is in danger. As a result, Medicaid-funded abortions were cut by 99 percent. This prohibits women from exercising their constitutional right to decide with their physicians whether or not to terminate a pregnancy.

Judge John Dooling Jr. ruled the Hyde amendment unconstitutional in a 642-page decision. The judge argued that medically necessary abortions cover a wider ground than the life endangerment test laid by the Hyde amendment. Opponents of the judge's ruling have already filed an appeal.

Gun-shot wounds may be self-inflicted

An Amherst male, whose family requested that his name and residence remain unidentified, was reported in stable condition last night in the intensive care section of Cooley Dickenson Hospital, after he was wounded by apparently self-inflicted gun shots Monday afternoon.

Amherst Police said they responded to the reported shooting at 1:13 p.m. Police said they believe a "black powder rifle" was the weapon used.

Floyd breaks through with album 'The Wall'

Review

PINK FLOYD
The Wall* (Columbia)

The commercial success of Pink Floyd blatantly defies convention. Consider last year's American album charts, and note which bands have held the number one spot: The Eagles, Styx, Fleetwood Mac. Note that all of these bands produce an innocuous brand of California pop which offers some pretty melodies but no experiments, no dissonance, nothing that can't be digested at first listen. And then along comes the Floyd with their Wall, an album whihc is lyrically provacative and disturbing, and musically at least as challenging as the latest works of Wire or Ultravox. Recall what Billboard magazine said about The Wall; "a good record for Floyd fans and audio buffs, but a bit too gloomy for Yuletide listening". Consider all this, and then check this week's charts in the same magazine, and note that The Wall has deposited itself in the number one position.

So much for Yuletide listening, but this does seem to show that Pink Floyd's themes are more universal than some of us would care to realize. The concepts for Pink Floyd albums are never particularly original—the idea for Animals was lifted straight from George Orwell—but the band's commitment and intelligence make it work. The theme of The Wall is one that we've heard before: a look at how society forces its members to construct psychological walls around themselves, substituting callousness for emotion and apathy for concern. But the Floyd use this theme only as a jumping-off point for a look at some very real examples of "wall-ism" in the modern world. As usual, the band has a sharp dramatic sense, and uses their music to vividly express their concerns. For example, when they write about how men are taught to exploit women, they construct a song calle "Young Lust," a harsh rocker which explores the hidden ugliness in the inflated cock-rock of bands like Foreigner. The song called "Comfortably Numb" looks at the use of drugs as a form of sublimation. The deceptive beauty of this song lulls you into submission, just in time to realize what they'be been singing about. The album's finale is a grotesque parody of Gilbert and Sullivan, in which the protagonist is put on trial for "showing feelings of an almost human nature." The verdict is exposure and the wall is exploded—leaving us only with a faint hope for new beginnings.

Musically, the album is nearly flawless. The four sides contain every kind of music that's ever been associated with Pink Floyd, from the pure electronics of their earlier work, to the drifting melodies of their middle period, to the almost-punk sound that the band first used on the Animals album. Some of the more interesting tracks here are a totally new kind of Pink Floyd music, which showns a Kraftwerk-ish, Euro-disco influence. This is used mot effectively on a song called "Run Like Hell," in which the pulsating rhythms reflect the tension of the lyrics. The vocals throughout the album (done mainly by bassist Roger Waters, who wrote most of it) are the best I've heard on any Floyd album, delivered with anger and urgency.

To correct one common misconception: Pink Floyd does not play "space music." The music on The Wall is designed to make us aware of, and possibly to shock us out of, our own comfortable numbness.

Hoopmen at UConn

By DAVE BRADLEY
Collegian Staff

Things were different the first time the University of Connecticut played the men's basketball team Jan 12. UMass' top scorer was out with a knee injury, the Minutemen were in the dregs of losing streak, UConn was coming off a win over Boston College, and the result was a 72-52 UMass loss.

When the Minutemen bus into Storrs for tomorrow's 8:00 p.m. game, a lot of things will have changed. Curtis Phauls and his 16.2 points per game will be there, the Minutemen will be riding a small wave of confidence as a result of their first win Saturday, UConn will have a 20-point loss on their minds, and the result will be....let's not get carried away.

A steadfast UMass backer might look at UConn's 13-6 record and point out that UConn lost to the University of New Hampshire, 67-59, to give UNH one of it's two victories this year (the other coming against Robert Morris College). Also on the bright side, UConn lost to the University of Rhode Island by 11 points whereas UMass only lost by five. And an eternal optimist might believe the Minutemen's single victory is the cure-all to their every basketball woe, a boost that will give them the confidence to beat UConn.

But optimism is a guarded quality around the UMass coaching staff.

"I'm not gonna say we're gonna win 10 in a row," Assistant Coach Ray Ricketts said after the win. But Ricketts has said all along that the team just needed that first win to give them the right mental attitude to turn things around.

"We think we've been through a tough stretch," said Head Coach Ray Wilson, "but we still have another tough stretch coming. I just hope they (UMass players) work even harder now that they know they're capable of winning. I have no reason to think they won't."

While UMass was beating Harvard Saturday, UConn was suffering it's biggest defeat of the year, an 84-64 loss against George Washington University. UConn has also lost to the University of Pittsburgh (77-72), St. Johns University (83-73) and Syracuse University (99-89).

To its credit UConn beat BC 83-71, Providence College 74-63 and Richmond University 81-79.

UConn forward Mike Mckay leads Huskies scorers with a 16.4 points per game average, followed by Corny Thompson with 16.1 and Bob Dulin with 11.2. Dulin leads the team with 78 assists.

Coach Dom Perno likes to vary his defenses and offense is of a deliberate, pat terned style.

Grapplers host UNH

In the semester home opener, the UMass wrestlers will play host to the Wildcats of New Hampshire tomorrow night in Boyden gym at 7:30. In the past ten years of UMass—UNH battles, UNH has failed to come out on top even once.

UMass may be without one major force when they face the Wildcats, 150 pound Kevin Murphy is suffering knee and hamstring injuries and it is still undetermined when he will wrestle again, according to assistant Coach Dave Foxen. Murphy was sorely missed in the team's recent loss to URI.

The wrestlers will be led by heavyweight John Allen who is looking to keep a perfect season going, his first in three years of wrestling at UMass. Allen has never lost to a UNH opponent and will be looking to keep that record going also.

The Matmen will also be armed with 158 pound tri captain Mike Carroll and 190 pound Bill McQuade who are looking to keep winning streaks alive—both will be attempting to make it seven.

The Matment are undefeated on home turf this season, having defeated Southern Connecticut, Albany, CW Post and Coast Guard in January wrestling Action.

If past meets are any indication of current performance, the UMass wrestlers should be able to chalk up one more in the win column. They defeated the Wildcats 30-19 and 30-15 in the past two years.

UM skiers each win two in weekend of slalom racing action

Women

By STEVE SEGAL
Special to the Collegian

The UMass women skied to two more decisive victories over the weekend of Feb. 2-3 at Berkshire East. The victories move the women one step closer to taking the Thompson division title.

A slalom race was the opening event of the weekend. The weather was extremely cold with a brisk wind gusting up the slopes. The Minutemen crouched down low to avoid the wind and by doing so place six women in the top ten.

Sue Voll from UMass, despite the strong winds, outskied her competitors by a large margin. Her combined time for two runs was 71.39, five seconds ahead of the second place finisher from Smith College. Placing third was Barbara Reynard with a time of 77.85 seconds and Laurie Valenti finished fourth with a time of 78.57 seconds. Smith College came in second in the meet closely followed by Amherst College.

On Sunday a giant slalom took place. The wind was calm and the temperature rose substantially. The snow stayed firm and fast throughout the day thus providing perfect snow for the race. UMass skied even stronger than ever placing six skiers in the top six positions and eight in the top ten.

Once again Voll dominated the slopes skiing to an easy win. Reynard skied into second place and Valenti finished third followed by Chris Fraser, Sue Gundy, Kim Loftus all from UMass. Amherst College took over second place with Boston College finishing third.

Men

By ANTONY KUNDERT
Special to the Collegian

The UMass mens ski team came up with two victories this past weekend at Berkshire East. On Saturday a slalom was held and on Sunday a giant slalom. The cold weather enabled the ski area to make plenty of artificial snow providing excellent conditions for the races.

The slalom race turned out to be a see-saw battle between UMass and Plymouth State College (P.S.C.). After the first run P.S.C. held the lead by a small margin of three tenths of a second. In the second run UMass pulled ahead to win the race by two seconds. Peter Dill of P.S.C. won the race and close behind was Pat Downes of UMass. Other UMass competitors who constributed to the team's victory were: Bob Grout, Kevin Nolan, Scott Broadhurst, and Scott Billings.

The giant slalom race on Sunday gave UMass their most convincing win of the season. Both runs were on fast straight courses and the cold weather added to the speed. The team placed six racers in the top nine with five counting toward the team victory. Chris Wakefield, a junior at UMass, won the race for his first league victory. Kevin Nolan was third, fourth and fifth place went to Scott Broadhurst and Pat Downes, and rounding out the team effort was Bob Grout finishing eighth. In the team standings, P.S.C. finished 10 seconds behind UMass and Northeastern took the third spot.

UM grads to Olympics

Three UMass graduates will be among 30 athletic trainers caring for athletes at the Winter Olympic Games which begin next week in Lake Placid, NY.

Jim Laughnane ('61), Chuck Demers ('53) and Jack Cooke ('67) were selected by the Lake Placid Olympic Organizing Committee to serve as host trainers. Demers has also been selected to work for the U.S. Olympic Team at the Summer Games in Moscow, if the U.S. attends.

Laughnane is currently the trainer for the UMass men's lacrosse and basketball teams, and is a former Redman hoop standout.

Demers is now the head trainer at nearby Deerfield Academy. He was a trainer at UMass in the early sixties.

Cooke is the administrator of the North Kingtown (RI) Medical Treatment Center. He served as a trainer at the University of Rhode Island from 1970-75.

Red Sox trainer Charlie Moss will be working at the Winter Games, also.

DePaul still first

By TOM CANAVAN
Associated Press

De Paul's Ray Meyer and Maryland's Lefty Driesell have been playing a waiting game and it's finally starting to pay off — at least in The Associated Press college basketball poll.

Meyer waited more than 37 years to reach the No.1 spot, and now that he's there, it appears he's planning to stay for a while.

Meyer's unbeaten Blue Demons were tabbed No.1 on all 59 ballots and collected a perfect score of 1,180 points from a national committee of sports writers and broadcasters Tuesday in easily outdistancing runnerup Syracuse. The vote also marked the third consecutive week De Paul, 19-0, has been the unanimous selection of the board and fourth week overall it has been ranked No.1.

"There's no monkey on our back anymore," Meyer said after last week's victories over Creighton and North Texas State.

It wasn't on Maryland's back either last week.

The up-and-coming Terps, No.12 a week ago, jumped into the No.7 spot this week with 844 points. The surprising leaders of the tough Atlantic Coast Conference posted victories over conference rivals Virginia and Duke in action last week, boosting their record to 16-3.

But it was the victory over Duke, a 101-82 blowout, that Driesell had waited for.

"I've been coaching for 25 years and this was one of the best games a team of mine has ever played," he said.

Syracuse, ranked fourth last week when it posted triumphs over Temple and Providence, replaced Oregon State in the No.2 position with 1,066 points.

Knapp says King's budget to affect tuition

By BRIAN O'CONNELL
Collegian Staff

BOSTON-UMass president David C. Knapp told the Board of Trustees yesterday the 1981 budget recommended by Governor Edward J. King would most affect the Amherst campus of the University by raising tuition and other fees.

Referring to a Trustee report that states King's proposal is "well beneath" the needed funding for UMass, Knapp said of all the state colleges the Amherst campus would be hurt the most.

"This budget reflects continuing problems at Amherst, which always appears to have a large budget in numbers, but also has a large program to deal with," Knapp said.

According to the Trustee's report, public higher education in Massachusetts received $128.7 billion in 1980. In 1981 the Trustees are asking for $142.1 billion, while King has suggested a $132.5 billion budget for the three UMass campuses; Amherst, Boston and Worcester.

Due to the reduced budget, Knapp indicated that UMass-Amherst would receive up to $26.8 million in recent tuition increases this year, an increase of $5.8 million from last year. As a result, students can expect to pay even higher tuition in upcoming years, Knapp said.

While praising the efforts being made in the areas of school re-organization and funding for the School of Engineering, Knapp said "I think it's safe to say we've had encouraging replies from people who approve of the way the Amherst camous is progressing."

During the meeting more than 20 UMass-Boston students picketed outside calling for the reinstatement of former UMass Boston Vice-Chancellor for Student Affairs Lee Vester Tubbs, ousted earlier this year.

Chanting "Hell no, Tubbs won't go," the group interrupted the meeting three times, once entering the board room waving hand made signs and chanting. No words were exchanged between the students and Board members.

UMass Amherst Chancellor Henry Koffler said he is concerned that 20 percent of the freshmen attending UMass do not graduate, and may be leaving school for reasons other than low grades. Koffler told the board members more than 200 faculty members had completed a two-day workshop during intersession designed to increase student attention on their schoolwork.

Anderson: The issues transcend politics

By ELLEN DAVIS
Collegian Staff

With the bright lights of a camera crew from the CBS show "60 Minutes" following him, Republican John Anderson brought presidential politics to Amherst yesterday, in hopes of attracting area college students to suport his uphill battle for the nomination.

In separate speeches to about 700 students at both UMass and Amherst, Anderson said the time has come for a new politics in this country, and said he has no regrets about trying to draw support from a broad coalition including Democrats and Independents.

"The issues of the 80's are so critical that they should transcend politics," he said.

Anderson said that the Republican party has remained the minority party because of its unwillingness to listen to new ideas which would help the country.

Among the new ideas which Anderson proposed is a 50 cent a gallon tax on gasoline, and a corresponding cut in Social Security taxes. He said gas rationing, as proposed by Senator Kennedy, would be too expensive to administer, too slow to implement, and would lead to a black market.

Anderson also called for passage of windfall profits tax, which would be used to increase mass transit, provide heating assistance to the poor, and develop renewable resources. "We ought to produce buses, not gas guzzlers," he said.

The ten-term congressman from Illinois said no new nuclear power plants should be licensed until new laws are enacted dealing with waste management and disposal.

On topics other than energy, Anderson reaffirmed his stand against registration and the draft, and said he supported abortion, the equal rights amendment, affirmative action, and the SALT II treaty.

He accused Republican opponent George Bush for his opposition to SALT II, and for running as a moderate in some areas of the country and a conservative in others. He attacked a number of Republican hopefuls for urging a five percent increase in defense spending, while

Students listen, react favorably

By ELLEN DAVIS

Although most of the students who listened to Republican Presidential candidate John Anderson yesterday said they were not supporting any presidential candidates at this point, most seemed impressed with Anderson's low-budget, issue-oriented campaign.

"He was very good," said senior Economics major Gary Kouner, "He has good ideas on crucial issues."

Jackie MacTaggert, a graduate student in Communications Disorders, said she particularly liked Anderson's idea of a 50 cent a gallon tax on gasoline to increase conservation. "I'm willing to do it."

Other students were receptive to Anderson's call for sacrifices. "He's very realistic," said freshman John Murphy.

Murphy and other students also liked Anderson's idea of getting away from party lines.

"He's very non-partisan for a Republican," said senior Robert Seigal.

Bonnie McKee, a junior Political Science major, said she liked Anderson's liberal and social policies, but said he didn't go far enough on the issue of stopping nuclear power.

Norman Mailer supports Kennedy

By MICHAEL SILVA
Collegian Staff

Author Norman Mailer appeared in the Campus Center yesterday and spoke in support of presidential hopeful Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, D-Mass., because, he said, "Kennedy is the only one who offers us a chance in the future."

Fielding questions from reporters and students for about 45 minutes at the Kennedy campaign table, the author of "An American Dream" and "Marilyn, A Biography" quickly attracted a small group of interest student despite the unpublicized appearance.

Describing Kennedy as a "genuine humanitarian" Mailer said "Kennedy has a distinguished liberal record" in the past ten years. "His record shows an above average concern with conservation and concern for the elderly and the poor. His humanitarianism represents some of his own feelings."

Citing Kennedy as the "only Democratic among the runners" and the only one "who offers us a chance in the future," Mailer said he hoped Kennedy will restore to the Presidency the dynamic energy that has been lacking since his brother, John F. Kennedy, was assinated in 1963.

"JFK didn't create any great legislations, but under him the American people began to think as a country. He created an era of expectation that we haven't had until now" said Mailer.

Mailer said he believes that Kennedy is fighting against Carter's increased popularity due to the Iranian crisis and Russian intervention in Afghanistan. "People want to go to war. It polarizes one's life. The American people have rallied behind the hostages and against the Russians."

Mailer

But, Mailer said, "Carter shouldn't be President of this country; he should be president of a polyester corporation. Carter doesn't have a political philosophy. In temperment he reminds me of a republican. His

The Soviets claim China aids Afghans

MOSCOW (AP) —The Soviets claimed yesterday that Chinese "advisers" are in Afghanistan alongside Moslem rebels. "Thousands" of the anti-communist rebels, the Soviets added, are receiving training in base camps in China for their fight against the Moscow-backed Afghan government.

The Soviet news agency Tass said the Chinese often accompany Afghan rebels across the frontier into Afghanistan, which shares a small border in the northeast with China as well as a large northern border with the Soviet Union.

Lebanon risks clash with leftist gunmen

BEIRUT, Lebanon (AP) — The Lebanese government vowed yesterday to replace withdrawing Syrian peacekeeping troops at key points in and around Beirut, risking clashes with Palestinian and leftist Moslem gunmen in the same areas.

The 5,000 Syrian troops in the capital, part of a 22,000-man force keeping the peace since the 1975-76 civil war, remained at their positions. Syrian President Hafez Assad said Monday the withdrawal would be delayed for a few days to give the Lebanese time to take over

Washington portrait location still pending

BOSTON (AP)—The most famous portrait of George Washinton—the original of the face on the dollar bill—may soon be jointly owned by museums in Washington and Boston and shared equally by both cities, it was learned yesterday.

The pending deal must still be approved by the boards of three institutions and the state attorney general, but negotiators expect a final settlement withing two weeks.

At stake are a pair of portraits of George and Martha Washington painted 184 years ago by Gilbert Stuart. The one of George, described by some as the most famous painting in America, is the original of the engraving on the dollar bill.

Spanish Embassy hostages being held

SAN SALVADOR, El Salvador (AP) Armed leftists occupying the Spanish Embassy vowed yesterday to hold the building and eight hostages, including the Spanish ambassador, "until our demands have been satisfied."

Leftist high school students also continued their occupation of the Education Ministry, holding Education Minister Eduardo Colindres and hundreds of others hostage.

Attorneys ask Court to suspend prayer law

BOSTON (AP)—Civil Liberties Union attorneys asked the state Supreme Court to suspend a new school prayer law yesterday, saying that even voluntary student participation violates the constitution's religious freedom protection.

Lawyers John Reinstein and Kenneth Sweder filed suit to have the state's high court issue a restraining order against further compliance with the law that took effect Tuesday.

Iranian President attacks 'lawless' embassy militants

By The Associated Press

Iranian President Abolhassan Bani Sadr, taking on the U.S. Embassy militants directly for the first time, attacked them as "lawless dictators" yesterday after they engineered the arrest of a government minister as an alleged ally of the CIA.

Later yesterday, in what could prove to be the government's second rebuke of the young Moslem radicals holding the embassy, authorities at Tehran airport detained a 49-member American delegation as it arrived in the Iranian capital at the invitation of the militants.

Western journalists in Tehran quoted airport sources as saying there was confusion over the status of the Americans' entry visas. The sources said the group might be kept overnight at the airport and then be sent back to the United States.

The developments seemed to foreshadow a possible showdown between the militants and Bani Sadr's emerging government that could affect the fate of the approximately 50 Americans held hostage at the embassy for 95 days.

Iranian leader Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini and his Revolutionary Council have accepted a U.N. plan for an investigation of the ex-shah's regime that American officials hope will lead to the release of the hostages.

But the Iranians continued to make conflicting statements yesterday about whether and when the hostages would be freed.

Bani Sadr's bitter denunciation of the militants followed the arrest of the minister of national guidance and information, Nasser Minachi.

The government official arrested was the minister of national guidance and information, Nasser Minachi.

The militants alleged in a national television broadcast Tuesday evening that documents they found in the embassy showed that Minachi had "close links with the CIA." The minister, who denied the charges, was arrested by the militia-like revolutionary guards at his home at about midnight.

Bani Sadr denounced the arrest as unauthorized by the state prosecutor, and assailed the state radio-television system for giving air time to the militants without prior government approval.

In an interview with the Tehran newspaper Kayhan, he said the embassy militants were paving the way for lawlessness in Iran and he called them "dictators who have created a government within a government."

"How could you expect a government employee to go to work feeling secure?" he asked. "No legal or judicial security in the country ... will undoubtedly lead to disorder."

It was the strongest attack yet on the militants by Bani Sadr, who has taken over as head of the Revolutionary Council, which will be dissolved after parliamentary elections scheduled for March.

Politicians plead repeal of drinking age but King considers raising the age to 21

BOSTON—Chair of the UMass Public Policy Committee, as well as state Rep. James G. Collins, D-Amherst, and state Sen. John W. Olver, testified yesterday before the state Government Regulations Committee, pleading for a repeal of the legal drinking age, which was upped to 20 last spring.

Kenneth R. Moore, a student Government Association senator, told legislators—in a prepared statement—that he could in the next few months be inducted into the armed services, but that "I am still not considered adult enough to go into a bar in my wheelchair upon returning home, and order a drink."

Moore is 19 years old.

In a prepared statement, Olver told the committee: "It gives me no pleasure to be here and tell the comi ittee 'I told you so' last year. People have died who otherwise would not have died."

Collins, in a prepared statement, told the committee that "little has changed since the new law went into effect," though he had expected the new law would prevent younger people from obtaining alcohol.

Olver, meanwhile, who two weeks ago filed a bill that would repeal the 20-years-of-age legal drinking law, cited state figures showing that driving fatalities for teenages has increased 17 percent since the legal age was upped.

The Associated Press, however, quoted John Donahue, a Boston alcohol rehabilitation counselor, as saying the highway-death trend would eventually be reversed. Donahue said other states have experienced "very significant decreases" in accident rates after implementing higher legal drinking ages.

Rep. Robert B. Ambler, committee chairman, also said he and most other members of his panel favor the present age. The Weymouth Democrat added that Gov. Edward J. King now shares their view although, at one point, King considered trying to hike the age to 21.

King, away on a trip to Venezuela, did not send any representative to outline his position for the panel. However, Ambler said that King had discussed with him the possibility of asking the Legislature to boost the age a notch higher, to 21.

"I told him that would be a fool's errand," Ambler said.

Further unrest at N.M. prison

By BILL FEATHER
Associated Press

SANTA FE, N.M. (AP) —Inmates set fires and flooded cells in a new round of violence at the riot-torn New Mexico State Penitentiary, and officials said yesterday they were trying to expedite the transfer of hardcore criminals out of state.

No injuries were reported in the Tuesday night outburst, which began after maximumsecurity prisoners were moved back into a cellblock.

Gov. Bruce King's news secretary, Jill Marron, said the group involved in the flare-up included men belived to be ringleaders in the 36-hour weekend uprising that left at least 36 inmates dead at the state's only maximum-security prison.

"They set mattresses, paper and blankets on fire," she said. "Officers entered the cellblocks to extinguish the fires and bring the situation under control."

The violence was the first since National Guardsmen and a Santa Fe police special weapons team moved into the penitentiary Sunday to take back control from the prisoners.

State Liquor Director Jim Baca, a spokesman for the prison, termed the latest disturbance "minor."

Hundreds of prisoners who had spent three nights huddled in blankets on a prison recreation yard were back inside the penitentiary Wednesday, with the "exception of the blacks who elected to stay out," Baca said.

"The blacks will be housed in an annex," Baca said. "It is my understanding that quite a few of them will be moved to other prisons."

Officials have said that much of the violence during the reign of terror was directed at informants, but Dr. Marc Orner, the prison psychologist, said racial tensions also were involved.

King said he hoped to move more than half of the 1,073 prisoners who have been accounted for moved to state and federal prisons in Kansas, Colorado, Arizona, Nevada and Oklahoma by Friday. Thirty-five New Mexico inmates have been transferred by air to a federal institution in El Reno, Okla.

The governor said "hardcore" prisoners would be moved out of state because New Mexico could no longer provide "maximum security incarceration." He said some inmates who had been held in protective security also would be moved to other prisons.

Unrest continues in the New Mexican State Penitentiary, the site of a weekend riot that left more than 35 inmates dead and over 50 persons injured. Officials said the prisoner in this cell was apparently killed and then thrown off a second floor balcony. (AP Laserphoto)

State legislators criticized in forum

By DAVID KELLOGG
Special to the Collegian

At an academic forum held during last night's Undergraduate Student Senate meeting. Provost Jeremiah Allen and Prof. Harvey Kline sharply criticized the attitude of state legislators toward public higher education.

"We have got to break the B.U., B.C., Holy Cross hold on this state," Kline, the secretary of the Faculty Senate, said. He encouraged students and alumni to demand from the General Court more money for state universities.

Allen, the chief academic officer on campus, made similar remarks in defending UMass. "The great problem," he said, "is not with the University, but with the Commonwealth's fiscal bind." While emphasizing that in an election year all state agencies would feel pressure from Beacon Hill, Allen felt that UMass-Amherst might fair well.

Questions and criticisms came from a panel of student senators. Many attacked what they said is the University's inability to put money and teachers where they are needed most. The recent cutting of 15 Spanish classes, 10 of which were reinstated, was an example.

"We simply have to provide the resources to study language if we have a language requirement," Allen said. "The difficulty is that students' plans for their academic careers change rather rapidly. The faculty is more stable than student interest."

Allen said teaching personnel cannot be moved around quickly in response to changing student needs, because faculty members are given multi-year contracts and some are given tenure.

Once a teacher is tenured, he or she locks up some of the University's money, the two explained. While majors students select change rapidly with the demands of the job market, tenured teachers are in for as long as they want.

While admitting the problems of a tenure system, both Allen and Kline stressed that it is essential to any good University. Tenure provides the security that encourages good professors to stay, Allen said, but added that sometimes a bad teacher is given tenure. Allen said this is a risk a school has to take if it wants a good staff.

There was no quorum at the senate meeting and no business was conducted.

Committee to revamp Alumni office

By ELLEN TUCHMAN
Collegian Staff

An ad-hoc committee has been established to reorganize the UMass Alumni Office and the Alumni Board of Directors.

An alumni subcommittee met last week with various campus organizations and proposed that regional clubs be established "to help begin the nucleus of linkage between kids and the campus," said Charlotte Rahaim, a professor in the School of Education and a member of the Alumni Board of Directors.

In such a program, Ms. Rahaim said, high school students would be recruited and oriented to UMass. Alumni would also aid graduates seeking job placement, she said.

'Regional clubs should be established to help begin the nucleus of linkage between kids and the campus,' said Rahaim.

"We're trying to assess what the needs of the campus are so that we can better meet those needs," Rahaim said.

Every UMass graduate is automatically a member of the Associate Alumni. Presently there are 70,000 members, 35,000 who reside in Massachusetts.

The 25-member Board of Directors makes all policy decisions which are then acted on by the Alumni Office.

One of the activities sponsored by the Alumni Office is the phonothon, run at least twice a year. After reporting to a central location, a group of alumni and student representatives then phone other UMass alumni all over the country requesting contributions.

The $300,000 collected this year is being used to supplement the University budget wherever funds are needed and the Principal Administration Office finally decides which departments receive money, Rahaim said.

The Alumni Board awards a $500 scholarship to an outstanding junior in each of the colleges and also grants scholarships to outstanding athletes.

To enable students to "make contacts and establish a network" in their field of interest, the Alumni Office has created the Skills Bank. Alumni are brought to campus to speak to students about their particular professions, giving students some ideas about their prospective careers.

A second subcommittee meeting is tentatively scheduled for Feb. 16.

King's local budget spending caps causes dilemma for Amherst

One of the ways Governor King has been trying to implement his campaign promise to reduce local property taxes has been a four percent spending cap on increases in local budgets. But King's more recent decision to balance the state's budget and freeze all local aid has left cities and towns with the dilemma of following the cap and trimming budgets or ignoring the cap and raising property taxes.

For the town of Amherst to stay within the cap, its fiscal 1981 budget can only increase by $172,000. The proposed budget is $4.48 million, about $648,000 over King's cap.

If the proposed budget is passed, Amherst selectman William Atkins said the tax rate will have to be increased from $28.20 to $31. Atkins also said this year's is a tight budget, "It includes the same town services funded in past years, but at no growth rate."

Town Manager A. Louis Haywood said it is important to keep in mind the tax rate in 1979 was $30.40, and passing this year's proposed budget will mean only a .60 increase over two years.

The budget will be voted on at the Amherst representational town meeting on April 28th. A two-thirds vote is needed to cut the budget and stay within the governor's tax cap or overrule the cap and increase property taxes.

Japanese summer program offered

By KITTYE ROSSMOORE
Special to the Collegian

This summer UMass students have the unique opportunity to study in Japan through a tuition-free program which was initiated by Hokaido University in Sappora, Japan in order to further a long-standing relationship between the two "sister" universities, according to David Day, chairman of the Hokaido University Committee.

Formal classes, taught in English, with the theme of "Contemporary Japan," will be held from June 23 to July 18 and focus on humanities and social sciences. Students can arrange to receive three UMass credits by enrolling in an independent study course "after the fact." The program is open to all Five-college students, with no prerequisites, language requirements, or limitations for entering.

They will be offering seminars and lectures on Japanese culture, politics, economics, industry, family life and education, all held in the morning so that afternoons will be free for extracurricular activities and field trips. Some activities will be prearranged, such as visiting a nearby volcano.

An information session is scheduled for February 12 at 7:30 p.m. in Herter Hall 201.

Total costs are under $2000 for the trip to Japan. Students will have prearranged housing with Japanese families, who will provide two meals a day, plus the benefits of first-hand knowledge about Sappora, a modern, "easy to use and delightful city" of one million people located on the plain island of Hokaido, Day said.

After arrival in Tokyo, students will need about $550 which includes the round-trip fare from Tokyo to Hokaido, an activity fee, and lunches. An additional $300 for personal and entertainment costs should be anticipated.

Hokaido University is a large and diverse institution with an excellent faculty, Day said. They will be offering seminars and lectures on Japanese culture, politics, economics, industry, family life and education, all held in the mornings so that afternoons will be free for extracurricular activities and field trips. Some activities will be prearranged, such as visiting a nearby volcanoe and each week will focus on a different aspect of Japanese life.

This curriculum provides academics as well as cultural enrichment through sightseeing and demonstrations of various Japanese arts such as the tea ceremony, calligraphy, woodblock printing and flower arrangement.

A study of Japanese language at no additional cost will be offered although not part of the basic program. Japanese language will not be necessary for getting around, since the Japanese people are very willing to speak English.

Exact costs will depend upon the availability of charter flights, but final arrangements will be left up to the students, Day said.

Ali Kenya campaign

NAIROBI, Kenya (AP) — Muhammad Ali, boxer-turnedpresidential envoy, took his campaign against the Moscow Olympics across Africa to Nigeria yesterday after sketching out a new role for himself as an enemy of South Africa.

Ali also made it clear during a two-day stay in Kenya that if he was going to be a diplomat this week, he would do it his way, regardless of the U.S. State Department advisers accompanying him and regardless of Soviet attempts to persuade him to cancel the tour.

Although on a U.S. government-sponsored trip to five nations, Ali did not hesitate to criticize the United States, along with Israel, as supporters of "the No. 1 trouble spot on the planet — racist, devilish, slavish South Africa."

Foreign festival focuses on culture

By BRIAN FITZ MAURICE
Special to the Collegian

Providing an open-eyed look at a variety of cultures, ranging from Turkish to Chinese, International Week is taking shape. The Foreign Affairs Office, representing over 80 nationalities, is now planning the tenth annual festival, set to start on March 24 in the Campus Center Auditorium.

The format for the week will feature a differnt culture every day with all programs free of charge. Representitives will provide an in depth and exciting look at their cultures with arts and crafts, traditional dances, fashions, samples of indigios meals and small dissertations on points of interest with slides.

Coordinators for the Week Pat Gula and Carol Cumps, staff workers in the Foriegn Affairs Office, called the event "an attempt to foster more interaction between these groups and UMass students."

Anticipating an even bigger turn out than last year's success which featured Greek, Indian and Thailand dancers and young French children singing folk songs, the coordinators are putting together an exciting schedule. The highlight of the week will be March 29 when a "fair" of over 20 different cultures takes place in the Campus Center Auditorium. Each group will have a booth with small artifacts for sale and samples of food. There will be tables in the center for eating and conversing, and stage events are planned throughout the day.

Nestle boycott endorsed

By SUZI CHAN
Special to the Collegian

The Graduate Student Senate decided to endorse a boycott of Nestle products and to write to the Western Massachusetts Broadcasting Council for a review of the WFCR program changes for the Third World Community at its first meeting Tuesday night.

The GSS decision includes the endorsement of the boycott as well as the urge of the removal of Nestle products from campus.

Nestle is the world's largest producer of infant formula and has been accused of aiding an epidemic of malnutrition and infection in the Third World.

Harriet Carter of the Western Massachusetts Infant Formula Action Coalition said the controversy over Nestle products is not the formula itself but rather an economic issue. She said that there is a stalemate at the present because of the increasingly sophisticated public relations by Nestle.

Carter said she would like to raise awareness at the local level by urging college students to join the boycott because of the huge array of Nestle products consumed daily. The products include those that bear the Nestle name as well as those not mentioning Nestle ownership on the labels, such as Nescafe, Taster's Choice, Souptime, Libby's canned goods and other food products.

Curtis Wohlers, Operations Committee Chair of the Campus Center Board of Governors, said that the Nestle Company has declined to send a representative to campus for a public debate and that would push for a campus-wide boycott and alert the University community.

Also, the GSS voted unanimously to draft a letter to be sent to the Western Massachusetts Broadcasting Council that would urge it to review the controversy over foreign language programming on WFCR, the public radio station on campus.

A Stress Workshop to help graduate students cope with their academic life was also proposed at the meeting. Fliers with information on time and location will be distributed across campus in the next few weeks.

Alcohol policy, conservation discussed

By ANGELA FERNANDES
Special to the Collegian

The UMass Resource Network yesterday discussed implementing the University alcohol policy, energy conservation and upgrading the UMass image.

Future meetings of the help group will concentrate on those programs individually, said Coordinator Judy Davis.

The network's primary function, said Davis, is to increase the availability of information and resources to students.

Davis said the group works toward developing services for students, such as the Outreach projects—which tend to the needs of commuting, older and non-traditional students. She said the New Students Program has been one of the network's most successful projects.

The network, part of the Student Development and Counseling Center, is located in Berkshire House, open 9 a.m. to 5 p.m. Monday through Friday and coordinated by Davis and Grant Ingel.

personality is 98 percent Republican" he added.

Republicans are stingy and Democrats have more vigor, said Mailer. "Kennedy is the only Democrat running."

Stating that "Anderson is hopeless...Connally I can do without...Bush is a pop-in-jay," Mailer said, "I believe that a candidate's personality makes as large a difference as his policies. It is terribly important to have a president that makes people think."

Kennedy is a dynamic person. He will help this country become more optomistic" added Mailer.

Mailer described himself yesterday, his first day of campaigning, as a "left conservative" who is for less government. "I hope my being here will have a little effect "upon students," said Mailer, "but I am just a straw—in other straws come they can be bound into a small broom."

Mailer will be speaking next week at Boston University and Brandeis University. "I'm only going out once a week because I'm working on a novel. I have debts to pay" he said.

"He's great—colorful" said one student who heard Mailer speak. He gives "a whole new look into politics," said Paula Theodosopousos, a freshman French major.

But senior health major Alex Speredelozzi though that Mailer's speech was uneventful. "He told me things I already knew. I'll be voting this year, but I'm still looking around."

Talk a ship out of sinking?

BOB CARROLL

Long before the final results from the Iowa caucuses had been tabulated, Ted Kennedy realized that his highly touted presidential pleasure cruise was sinking faster than the Titanic.

While Ted steadfastly pointed to foreign affairs such as the hostage situation in Iran and the Russian invasion of Afghanistan as the reasons for Carter's tremendous popularity in the polls, it was becoming increasingly clear to most Kennedy aides that his own performance, since declaring his candidacy in November, left much to be desired. CBS reporter Roger Mudd had, after all, even managed to befuddle Ted by asking him the vexing question of why he wanted to be president!

Even in his personal appearance, Ted left his audiences bored by repeating vague policy positions and showing little or no emotion while speaking. From the dynamic leader of only six months back, Ted had turned into a stuttering incoherent fool who could not even be sure of winning his home state of Massachusetts.

Thus, Ted embarked on his last-chance salvage mission with his speech of January 28th, a speech which he hoped would outline his differences with President Carter and give voters a reason to mark their ballots next to his name. Kennedy's 45-minute address at Georgetown University was to be the torpedo to burst the Carter bubble and revive his sagging campaign contributions. Perhaps on these grounds the speech was a success. However, many of Kennedy's new positions seemed either unworkable or downright stupid.

Foremost among these as examples of desperate politics was Kennedy's call for a six-month freeze on inflation followed by mandatory controls on everything from wages to profits, prices, dividends, interest rates and rent.

Despite the fact that most major economists have denounced controls ever since Richard Nixon imposed them in 1971, Ted came out strongly for more government regulation (as if we didn't have enough already). The very idea that the bureaucratic idiots in Washington could put the economy on a saner course is comical to most people, but not to Ted. Apparently he and Richard Nixon know something we don't.

Ted walked on safer ground when discussing President Carter's handling of the present foreign crises, and his overall "lurching" from one crisis to the next. Many of his points were well taken, especially his observation that the U.S. does not possess sufficient military might to back the "Carter Doctrine" of repelling Soviet aggression in the Persian Gulf. However, when Kennedy proclaimed his continued belief in the value of detente and not angering the Russians, many voters were turned off. Kennedy coupled this with an offer of an "olive branch" to Ayatollah Khomeini, an idea which is anathema to most Americans.

Senator Kennedy's Georgetown Address was, from beginning to end, a major political gamble, but it was one which circumstances forced him to take. At least now the Kennedy campaign can focus on issues instead of the Kennedy character, but even this change probably won't be enough. People will generally abandon a sinking ship rather than try to patch it up.

Carter policies political pathology

JIM MORAN

How easily the masses are manipulated—at least when it comes to Presidential primaries, apparently. Back in October, the incumbency of our 39th President, Jimmy Carter, seemed perilously close to a demise. The Gallup and Harris organizations were saying all kinds of "mean and ugly and nasty" things about ol' Peanutpuss, giving him the lowest ratings one could imagine—even lower than Der Fuhrer Nixon. Public confidence in the man who sleeps at 1600 Pennsylvania Avenue was badly shaken in the face of rising inflation of commodity items, seven percent unemployment rates, and oil shortages. Then came Iran.

It is no secret that Jimmy Carter had a vested interest in the Middle Eastern nation now ruled by the Ayatoilet. Let us not forget that Jimmy Carter was a part of the thinktank known as the Trilateral Commission—David Rockefeller's solution to world "reorganization." The ultimate aim of the Commission was to exploit Third World nations for sake of monetary gain, sucking up their natural resources and incorporating the respective citizenries into the elite ruler's blueprint plan for world monopoly. The Commission's "Man in Iran," so to speak, was Shah Mohammed Reza Pahlevi. When he was put out and Khomeini was in, that vested interest was jeopardized.

It is also no secret that Khomeini's economy was falling apart, that the Iranians were inept to contend with the repair and maintenance of our vacated technological warehouse, and that there was growing oppositon (the Kurds in the Northwest among it) to the Ayatollah's backward's rule. Khomeini needed a domestic crisis as much as Jimmy Carter needed a foreign issue. The two worked well together and the taking of some 50 human beings' lives became the thread to bind them together. Then came Afghanistan.

When the Soviet Union sent their "attitude readjustment facilitators" into Afghanistan, the world order was truly shaken and both Carter and Khomeini could play off the potential for disaster to their best advantage. Khomeini could get Soviet support against economic sanctions directed at Iran in the United Nations—a meaningless body. Carter could use the Soviet invasion as a basis for initiating a conservative but popular approach towrd foreign policy—get the Russkies! Whether or not this dialectical rationale is correct, whether the crises are created and exploitative or genuine and self-generating, the fact remains that this world is in bad shape. And what has Carter's horseplay cost the people of the United States?

Well, in terms of security and legitimate humanitarian concerns regarding de-escalation of military amments, the cost is great. It has set foreign policy back about 20 years in the context of post-World WarII attempts at negotiating in good faith through detente. It has put the proposal for attaining a limit on the manufacturing and positioning of military weaponry out of debate for a long while. Not that the Soviets didn't ask for it, and not that we can't use that as a political device for encouraging more pacifistic behavior. But one cannot help but realize that we may have overreacted. The Soviets invaded Czechoslovakia in 1968 and we did virtually nothing about that. We didn't

What has this Carter approach to foreign policy done to Americans—a more impacted concern? Well, it will mean higher food prices for consumers in the 1980's due to the fact that Jimmy Carter placed an embargo on the shipment of 18 million metric tons of soybean and grain supplies. One out of every three acres of U.S. farmland is planted for export purposes, and the Soviet Union was our third largest buyer in 1979. Now, of course, the agricultural industry must make up their losses somehow. What better than to charge U.S. consumers more for their output?

This Carter foreign policy won't just affect food prices though. Since the U.S. relies heavily upon its agricultural exports to offset the price of importing foreign oil, appliances, automobiles, and other items, it means a further increase in this inflation-recession economy trend. Food exports last year earned 32 billion dollars for us, to make up 19 percent of our total exports. And even then we had a trade deficit of some 23 billion dollars. Carter's actions have created another crisis—one which will not be so politically-beneficial to him. But he's a good patriot.

A few weeks ago, Vice President Walter Mondale lashed out at this boss's main opponent, Sen. Edward Kennedy, for not behaving in a "patriotic manner." Mondale basedhis criticism upon Kennedy's public claims of disagreement with the President over sending the Shah back to Iran, and upon Kennedy's criticism of Carter's grain embargo. It was a very interesting case of "history repeating itself." We can look back to 1968, when then-Vice President Hubert Humphrey was defending his boss, Lyndon Johnson, against the criticisms being made by the late Sen. Robert Kennedy and Eugene McCarthy over Johnson's handling of the Indochina War.

Mondale's assertion, much more vocal than the past one of the more-intelligent and independent Humphrey, that political candidates should not criticize a sitting President's decisions on a sensitive matter of foreign policy is absurd. Absurd, because Jimmy Carter is not only President Jimmy Carter but candidate Jimmy Carter. Absurd, because Carter's crisis is significantly less-comparable to that of Johnson's plight with Vietnam. After all, 50 persons hardly compare to the hundreds of thousands of American lives lost in Indochina. Absurd and hypocritical, because Mondale was, in effect, criticizing Kennedy for exercising his American right to freedom of speech by challenging the status quo of the White House. And if Mondale could get it through his thick skull, doesn't it appear contradictory, in light of our policy against Soviet totalitarianism, to place restrictions on freedoms our government is supposed to ensure? Hubert Humphrey would be hard pressed to feel admiration for his protege (Mondale) if he were alive today. The difference between the two is that Humphrey was a true statesman, while Mondale is a poser.

Then came the offensive against Senator Kennedy. We have seen the Reader's Digest allegations concerning the Senator's behavior at Chappequidick, challenging Kennedy's claims about the time and water currents on the day of an incident which took place over 10 years ago. Later, we saw these experts were misquoted and the Digest and Washinton Star accounts were merely speculative. But it didn't matter that these allegations against Kennedy were contrived. They were timed so as to affect the outcome of the Iowa caucus.

We must not also forget that Reader's Digest is a bastion of conservative thought, which boasts a board of directors that has on it old Nixon ally and former Defense Secretary Melvin Laird. That could possibly lead to some biased reporting. And it works well with Carter and his corporate cronies' plans for dealing with Edward Kennedy, a rich but socially concerned politician.

It may work as well as their efforts in dealing with his late brothers.

Off campus housing: bad but not hopeless

To The Editor:

Although Chris Schmitt's article in the Collegian (1/27/80) accurately cited the low vacancy rate in Amherst we are afraid that the bleak picture presented of the local housing 'scene' may discourage students from looking at all. There is no doubt that finding adequate and affordable housing in this area can be a hassle; but nevertheless, the Off Campus Housing Office does serve as the best clearing house that student tenants have for finding their housing. And, while we appreciate that word of mouth is one way people have of obtaining rental housing, we would like to emphasize that there is no substitute for an office that has consumer information and workshops along with counseling for tenants. OCHO is not simply a facility for the rental of property; some of the other services that OCHO provides to local tenants is: mediation of disputes between tenants and landlords, tenants and tenants, assistance to people trying to set up cooperative households. So...while we are most appreciative of the Collegian highlighting the problems that afflict student tenants we would also like students to remember that there is more to renting than simply slotting ourselves into any available room.

Energy experts say US dependent on 'hostile oil'

CAMBRIDGE, Mass. (AP) – The United States is becoming increasingly dependent on "hostile oil" from countries in the Mideast and Africa that "to one degree or another, regard the West as an enemy," two Harvard University energy experts warned yesterday.

In an article in the current issue of Foreign Affairs magazine, Robert Stobaugh and Daniel Yergin also condemned domestic oil and natural gas price controls as "a great disservice" which encourage consumption, and recommended conservation measures to achieve a no-growth U.S. energy policy for the 1980s.

"Our whole industrial system is like a vehicle built to operate on $3 (a barrel) oil, puffing along with an inefficient engine and with a body leaking vast amounts of energy," they said in the article, published yesterday.

Stobaugh, a Harvard Business School professor, and Yergin, a lecturer at Harvard's Kennedy School of Government, headed the six-year Harvard Business School energy study that resulted in the book, "Energy Future," published last May.

The authors said Iran, Iraq, Libya and Algeria supplied 30 percent of world market oil in 1978, but now are "decidedly antagonistic to the United States."

"Along with other Western nations, the United States has become increasingly dependent on nations that ... show little compunction in subordinating oil supply to other considerations," they said.

Iraq, Algeria and Libya supplied the United States with about 20 percent of its imported crude oil supply in 1979 compared with about 10 percent in 1973, Yergin said in an interview.

U.S. purchases of Iranian oil were banned by President Carter after militants took a group of Amricans hostage.

The authors also claimed that Saudi Arabia, producer of onethird of the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries' oil and supplier of 7.4 percent of U.S. oil needs, no longer can be considered a stable supplier.

"The seizure in November of the Grand Mosque in Mecca by perhaps 700 militants may well prove, in retrospect, to have been the single most important development relevant to energy in 1979," they wrote, adding, "that such a conspiracy could go undetected is deeply disturbing."

promising to balance the budget and reduce taxes.

Anderson charged President Carter with using federal money to play politics, saying that perhaps it would be more appropriate to play "Santa Claus is coming to Town" than "Hail to the Chief" for him.

He also labeled President Carter's actions in response to Afghanistan as "politically motivated," and said that Carter should invite Iran's new president to the U.S. and offer him any forum he wishes to lay out Iran's grievances against U.S. policies.

State subsidizes highest paid employees

Knapp receives entertainment money, chauffeur

By STEVEN A. COHEN
Associated Press Writer

BOSTON (AP) – While most taxpayers are cutting back to cope with skyrocketing prices, the state continues to subsidize some of its highest paid employees with housing and other benefits.

Rising oil prices probably don't mean much to the presidents at five of the 10 state colleges, where all utilities are included in rents they pay for campus homes. The rents range from $113 a month at Westfield State College to $250 a month at Bridgewater State College.

While University of Massachusetts president David C. Knapp doesn't have a campus home, he gets a $800 housing allowance monthly, as well a state car, chauffeur and additional money for entertaining.

His salary is $58,000, according to UMass spokeswoman Carol Cohen, who also noted that Knapp was making $59,500 as provost at Cornell before coming to Massachusetts in 1978.

All the state college presidents receive an annual salary of $50,378, but all don't benefit from the housing subsidy.

Those that get the subsidy run campuses which happen to have presidents' homes, said Ian Forman, spokesman for the state college system. Presidents at schools without homes are out of luck.

Besides Westfield and Bridgewater, presidents' rents, which include all utilities, are as follows: Framingham, $197.50; North Adams, $162.50; Salem, $158.50.

There also is a house for the power plant engineer at the Bridgewater campus. He pays $121 per month.

While the president at Fitchburg State College doesn't get a house, the superintendent of buildings and grounds does, for $174 per month.

The presidents of the 15- campus community college system don't do so well, but the presidents at the three state universities do better.

Southeastern Massachusetts University President Donald E. Walker, who receives an annual salary of $55,980, pays $215 a month for rent at the SMU president's home. That includes all utilities.

Walker's assistant, Daniel G. Aldrich, said there also is a $5,500 contingency fund which the president can dip into for entertainment, although "it all doesn't go for entertainment."

Mayall sings to supportive crowd

By MARC FAGELSON
Collegian Staff

Flat Street in Brattleboro, Vt., the scene of John Mayall's Tuesday night show, is a confusing place to attend a concert.

It resembles the nocturnes in bullfighting, in that it serves as a proving ground for younger musicians trying to get their break, while at the same time it provides a graveyard for former stars on their way out.

What makes Flat Street more confusing, however, is its location. Brattleboro is rarely visited by name rock groups so that when a known band visits, everyone in the town who has ever heard of the band will take advantage of the once-in-a-lifetime aspect of the show.

When the performers finally materialize onstage, the audience is always extra supportive and sometimes is able to push the band into playing a memorable show. Sometimes, the older bands get up there and die. But on those occasions when the crowd's enthusiasm infects the performer, the show is invariably a joy.

John Mayall's first show of the evening was a pleasure all the way.

Concentrating on his older numbers, as well as many standards, Mayall and band gave the crowd a lesson in De Blues.

Mayall hit the stage wearing shorts and a red bandanna. His only concession to age seemed to be some grey hairs and a slight paunch.

The band launched immediately into Freddie King's "Hideaway." Although Mayall no longer surrounds himself with a Clapton, Green or Taylor, his band was full of talent and energy, as the frantic solos of guitarist James Crill-Smith led the way

Mayall proves his voice is still strong as he belted out Mose Allison's "All Your Love." Mayall crouched behind his organ leaping and swirling his mop of hair with the music. His harp playing was gratifying and served as a link to his sound of the past.

Chicago slide guitarist, J.B. Hutto (and the New Hawks) will provide a real treat for blues and boogie enthusiasts Friday, February 8 at the Bluewall. Tickets are $2.

Gymmen easily defeat MIT and Dartmouth

By BOB MITCHELL
Collegian Staff

Co-captain Hugh O'Neall earned an all-around score of 45.65, and teammate Bob Donahue tallied a 45.20 to lead UMass men's gymnastics team to an easy 237.30-195.15 victory over Dartmouth in a tri-meet Tuesday night, at the Boyden auxiliary gymnasium. MIT finished third with a 165.80.

The Minutemen swept all six events on the evening and cruised to the double victory. Dave Buegler and Steve Craig teammed up on floor exercise, scoring a 9.25 and 8.85 respectively, to give UMass it's first event. The home team outclassed both opponents on the floor by a wide 13-point margin.

Tim Barry earned an 8.20 on the pommel horse to lead the Minutemen to their 2nd event victory. Donahue scored an 8.0 to aid the squad to the triumph. Umass continued it's domination in the still rings competition, as Dave Felleman turned in an 8.25 set and Donahue chipped in with a 7.8.

The Minutemen kicked off the second half of the meet in fine fashion, as Bob Lamb led the way with a 9.0 to give them their fourth straight event win. O'Neall and Craig turned in 8.95 efforts and Buegler and Donahue added 8.80 each in defeating Dartmouth and MIT with a balanced attack.

In the parallel bars competition, UMass won by their slimmest margin, defeating Dartmouth by a thin 37.90-34.05. MIT was a distant third at 24.60. Donahue had a fine 8.05 routine on the p-bars, while mate Frank Cohen added a 7.60.

At this point the Minutemen were up by a big 31-point bulge, 198-167, and were "getting tired of the long meet," in the words of UMass Coach Roy Johnson. However it did not snow in their performance, as they trounced the Big Green by 11 points in the horizontal bar event to cruise home with a big 42-point victory.

Cohen earned an 8.75 on the bar, while O'Neall chipped in with an 8.15 to earn the Minutemen their sixth consecutive event victory.

The Minutemen performed well and will have to be ready for tougher competition this Saturday, when they host the Navy Midshipmen in the Boyden Auxiliary gymnasium at 2:00 p.m.

selling his ass all over the place like the biggest hooker in the world."

"Are you a prostitute?" someone from the audience asked.

"A little one," he replied, "We're all hookers."

Lee moved on to other subjects, "Anthropology 101" as he called it, explaining why human beings have two sets of eye teeth. He then explained how the world came to be.

"I don't know why we're called earth," he digressed "We should be called water."

Perhaps the character of the Spaceman was best summed up when a Cincinnati Reds fans asked him why he threw the blooper to Tony Perez in the 1975 World Series.

Lee took another hit off his Molson and answered, "Aw why not?"

He then left last night to return to his newfound home of Bellingham, Washington, "the land of silverhead trout, clean air, and no nuclear power plants to the west."

Spikers at Yale 1st league meet

By MAUREEN SULLIVAN
Colligian Staff

The last time the men's volleyball team faced Yale University was at the New England Open at Springfield College last March. In a closely-played quarterfinal match, Yale nosed out UMass 15-13.

These same teams meet again tonight at New Haven.

For UMass, this marks their first formal match, as none of the games from last Sunday's Jamboree in New Hampshire count in the overall record. Also, this is the first match UMass will play under the Eastern Collegiate Volleyball League schedule, a schedule that includes Springfield College, MIT, and Penn State.

UMass women top NE poll

The UMass women's basketball team regained the top spot in the New England college poll this week, after falling to number two last week. The Minutewomen had been number one all season before dropping to second behind Providence College last week. The hoopwomen defeated the Lady Friars Thursday, 67-61. Providence is number two this week.

Boston University, the University of Rhode Island and the University of New Hampshire round out the top five. UMass has defeated BU and URI (twice), but fell to UNH, 76-61 Jan. 21.

Huskies jolt UMass back into reality, 73-55

STORRS, CT - The UMass men's basketball team was jolted out of its euphoric state (derived from the streak-snapping win over Harvard Saturday) last night by the Connecticut Huskies as the boys from Storrs recorded their second win over the Minutemen this season.

UConn had defeated UMass, 72-51 Jan. 12 at the Springfield Civic Center.

Last night's game was similar to the first encounter between the two clubs.

UConn broke out to an early lead but couldn't keep it and the Minutemen were within striking distance at the half. But again it was a second half spurt which put the game away for the Huskies.

UConn came out flying for the packed (4,600) Fieldhouse and took a 10-2 lead on hoops by Corny Thompson, Mike Mckay, Jim Sullivan and Bob Dulin(2).

The Huskies maintained a comfortable lead through much of the first half, leading by as much as 15 at 30-15 with four minutes remaining in the half. But UMass finished the frame with a flurry and pulled to 36-25 at the half on baskets by Jay Stewart and Tom Witkos.

UMass' Dan Wright scored the first hoop of the second half to pull his team to within nine, but that was as close as UMass would get.

The Huskies cruised from there, ending with an 18-point win, which had to have a sobering effect on the young UMass team for whom the "thrill of victory" was all to shortlived.

UConn, now 14-6, won the game by dominating the backboards, gathering 38 rebounds compared to just 29 for the Minutemen.

"I think we got a good start," said Thompson, who scored 16 points and grabbed a game-high 11 rebounds. "We got that lead and sat on it."

Forward Mckay led all scorers with 17 points and Huskies Glenn miller and Dulin had 11 and 10 respective.

Freshman guard Ty nedd had 12 for UMass as did teammate Curtis Phauls. Phauls also had 10 rebounds. Witkos and Wright each had 10 points.

The Minutemen fall to 1-17 on the season and face some tough Eastern Eight contests in the final month of the season including the next game in Curry Hicks Cage Saturday against Villanova. It's the first game in the Cage for the Minutemen since a Jan. 5 76-70 loss to Rutgers in what was one of the team's best performances of the year. On the other hand, the Minutemen are facing a Wildcat team that defeated them 92-59 Jan. 9 in Philadelphia, the second biggest loss suffered this year by UMass bettered only by Michigan's 112-64 demolition of the Minutemen. Villanova lost to Notre Dame by one at the buzzer in South Bend, where it's very tough to beat the Irish. The Cats boast one of the finest freshmen in the East in 6-7 forward John Pinone, who hails from Wethersfield, CT. Game time is 7:30 and all that is needed for admission is a validated current UMass ID.

UMass Wrestling Coach sets sight on mat at Moscow Games

By DONNA SULLIVAN
Collegian Staff

Dave Foxen is a graduate student here at UMass and assistant coach of the varsity wrestling squad, but mostly, he is a wrestler himself, a wrestler with his eyes on this year's Summer Olympics.

If the 1980 Summer Olympics are not the subject of a boycott, he has a strong chance of seeing action.

"I would have to go along with any type of boycott," he said. "You cannot separate athletics from politics even though some people say that you cannot mix them. I thought about this a lot and if you are going to compete in anything at the Soviet Union it is saying that the people and what they do are alright."

Foxen has more than fifteen years of continuous wrestling under his belt as well as numerous titles and championships. Just recently he wrestled in three separate tournaments and placed first in all three.

In January, Foxen saw action in the Wilkes Open, also called the Rose Bowl of Wrestling, in which he was seeded first. He won the tournament with a record of five wins and no losses. The Rose Bowl is open to all wrestlers on the east coast.

Last weekend, the 150 pound Foxen went to the Michigan Open and came back with yet another championship and a six and zero tournament record.

"They keep me in shape," he said of the tournaments. "The Michigan Open is a prep type tourney for the National AAU's."

This weekend, the athlete from UMass will be competing in Cuba, against wrestlers from all over the world. "I should do alright," he said. "East Germany and Russia will be tough and the Cubans have a guy who is pretty good."

Then it's on to Chicago, and then more tournaments after that, and in April, the start of the Olympic trials.

According to Foxen, there will be regional trials, the top two going to national trials, and the top eight finishers in the nationals will wrestle down to one man in each weight class – the Olympic team.

"I should be able to get to the top eight," said Foxen. Currently, five wrestlers in the nation are ranked ahead of him in the 150 pound class, and all five have wrestled and defeated Foxen in competition. It is not much of a deterrent, though, as Olympic trials are hardly an ordinary wrestling situation.

Spaceman speaks out

By DANNY GUIDERA
Collegian Staff

"What do you want to be when you grow up," was the question from the audience of more than 1750 last night at the Fine Arts Center Auditorium.

Bill Lee sipped on his bottle of Molson Golden Ale and shrugged, "dead."

Lee, the lefthander personified, the "Spaceman," the "organic ballplayer" who pitched for the Red Sox from 1969 until his unceremonius departure in 1978 traded his own strange brand of wisdom with students as he spoke on such subjects as the Red Sox and baseball structure in general, internatinal politics, the origin of the Universe, college, and the good life to be had in his new home, the Pacific Northwest.

The Spaceman, who said his image "was created by a righthanded world" made his second trip to campus as part of the Distinguished Visitors' Program, his first being in 1975.

What is an "organic ballplayer?

"It's someone who distains pesticides, artificial turf, and aluminum bats," said Lee as he walked through the Campus Center Concourse,"someone who follows the true meaning of sport in America."

Lee mused on Baseball Commissioner Bowie Kuhn who he has from time to time had run-ins with. "Bowie's a nice guy. He likes me. I like him. It's just that he's got his priorities screwed up." Kuhn fined Lee $250 for admitting that he had used marijuana "on buckwheat pancakes."

Kuhn fined Lee because he judged that Lee's remarks were not in the best interest of baseball.

"The best interst of baseball," said Lee, "Well, for a start they could pay the Haitians who make the baseballs more and they could work their way up from there. Baseball shouldn't be only for the best interests of the owners. There shouldn't be astroturf ("Aw, it's disgusting," he said later "made by multi-national corporations...)"

"The ideal ballpark would be set out in the country somewhere, with jogging trails all the way to the park, serve natural foods, run along the edges of the fences, drink some beer..." But not too much beer, Lee said, so the fans don't get rowdy.

On his Spaceman image: "People call me the Spaceman, but he's (Stan Papi who the Red Sox received from the Montreal Expos in 1978) the one who's had the shock treatments. And they can't give them to Zim (Red Sox manager Don Zimmer) because he's got steel plates in his head."

Lee predicted that there would be a strike of major league baseball players during the 1980 season.

"The owners want to break us," he said, "They're going to frame me and Bernie (Carbo, whose reassignment to the Cleveland Indians in 1978 prompted Lee to take a tempotary vacation from the Boston club.(for covorting with a moose or picking locks on the 14th floor of the Statler-Hilton and make us the Sacco and Vanzetti of baseball."

"But how can you call it a strike," said Lee,"A strike involves rising up against some degenerate owners. How can you do that with a guy like Reggie Jackson

Bill proposes college student excise tax

By RICHARD NAGLE
Collegian Staff

A bill that would give cities and towns the authority to impose a tax of up to $75 per year on all students of higher education institutions has been filed in the state House of Representatives.

The bill, filed by Representative Barney Frank, D-Boston, would "impose an excise on the privilege of attending an institution of higher education."

Rep. Frank was not available for comment yesterday.

The tax would "not exceed" $75 per year for full-time students and $20 for part-time students. The proposal provides that the tax would be collected separately at the same time as tuition and other fees, the funds being payable to the treasurer of the town or city where the institution is located.

Ken Mosakoski, legislative director of the Student Center for Educational Research and Advocacy said the tax would be a "head tax" comparable to the long-outlawed polls tax where citizens had to pay a tax in order to vote. Mosakowski speculated the reason for the tax may be due to a "revenue shortfall" in the state budget.

The tax would, if enacted, affect nearly all of the state's 380,000 students enrolled in both private and public higher education institutions in Massachusetts.

The tax would, if enacted, affect nearly all of the state's 380,000 students enrolled in both private and public higher education institutions in Massachusetts.

Joanne Mazzarelly of state Senator John Olver's (D-Amherst) office quoted the Senator on the proposal as saying, "It is absurd." Mazzarelly said that the bill may be an attempt to have students pay their share of the city or twon services sutdents use, adding that the bill may gain support in the Boston area with its high student population.

Representative James Collins, D-Amherst, said, "I don't think the tax would be a good idea," adding, "Its outrageous." Collins said the bill is "patently unconstitutional."

"If you look at the full issue, though the students use public services, particularly in Boston, they pay through the purchase of other goods. They help Boston economically," Collins said.

Collins said that Rep. Frank may have filed the bill on behalf of a constituant in his district. "He may not support the bill but it's responsibility as a representative to file it."

Dr. John Mallan, vice-president for Governmental Affairs of the American Association of State Colleges and Universities in Washington, D.C. said, "I'm 99 percent positive that no other state in the country has a similar proposal or law."

Mallan said that he was "flabbergasted" and added that the bill would only serve to "drive students out."

Both Collins and Olver said they did not expect the bill to pass.

The bill will have a public hearing on February 27 at the state house.

Residents of Amherst apartments in court battle to stop evictions

By JACK GALLAGHER
Collegian Staff

Attorneys were to go before Judge John F. Murphy this morning in Hampshire District Court to discuss whether a temporary restraining order could be issued to delay the 8 a.m. eviction of three tenants living in apartments on North Prospect Street who failed to pay their rent Feb. 1.

Atty. Richard Howland, who is representing the landlord, Edward Kelly, said last night the eviction "won't happen at 8 a.m." adding that he and Atty. Mark Eckstein, who is representing the tenants, would go before Judge John F. Murphy this morning.

Eckstein yesterday attempted to persuade Murphy to issue a temporary restraining order after the judge ruled in favor of Kelly at an eviction hearing.

According to yesterday's ruling, a deputy county sherrif was to drive a pickup truck to the tenants apartments at 8 a.m. and carry out the eviction ruling.

The tenants, two of whom are UMass students – the other a welfare recipient with a 7-year-old daughter – said last night that they were out of money and that they did not know where they would go if evicted.

Margaret Carroll, a UMass cum laude graduate of 1979, said her life would be "in turmoil" if she were evicted. The 26-year-old English graduate has been living in the North Pleasant Street apartment 3½ years.

Laura Brezinsky, a 26-year-old UMass first-semester senior, said she is carrying a heavy academic schedule and that if she were evicted, she would be "out on the street without a place to live" and "might have to quit school."

Carroll, whose daughter, Heather, attends Wildwood School, said she would "be hopping from friend to friend" for a place to stay if she were evicted. She said she plans to send her daughter to her mother's house in Holden until she finds a place to live.

Carroll said she is in the process of applying to graduate school, and that she would have problems with her Graduate Record Exams, which she plans to take in two weeks, if she were evicted. She said she belatedly paid Kelly $226 of the $264 that she receives monthly from the Department of Public Welfare for February's rent and that he has not yet returned that money.

Brezinsky, Carroll and Livingstone Semakula, the latter of whom is a UMass graduate student, in September formed a tenant's union along with the six other tenants who live in the block of apartments at 94-96 North Prospect St. The tenants withheld rent for alleged health violations in October, and were taken to court by Kelly, Brezinsky said.

Brezinsky said Kelly filed a complaint against her and Semakula because they failed to sign a lease, which she said he never offered to have signed. A court hearing was set for Oct. 3, she said, but that she never received a notice of that hearing. As a result, she and Semakula were found in default of court, she said.

Brezinsky said the tenants agreed to an out-of-court settlement concerning the alledged health violations, and that she and Semakual received $100 in retribution for spoiled food. She said the food spoiled because the apartment's refrigerator did not work properly.

Knapp denies entertainment allowance

By BRIAN O'CONNELL
Collegian Staff

A spokesperson for UMass president David C. Knapp yesterday denied reports stating Knapp receives an entertainment allowance along with his regular salary, as reported in an Associated Press story yesterday.

The AP article stated that Knapp received an annual salary of $58,000, as well as a monthly housing allotment of $800, use of a chauffered state car, and additional money for entertaining.

Carol Cohen, Knapp's press secretary, said additional money was directed to Knapp's office out of the university's trust fund, but the money was used to "keep the office in working condition." Cohen also defended Knapp's use of a state car, but added there was no full-time "chauffer" employed by the university. "We don't even drive to the Boston campus," said Cohen, "we take a bus."

'We don't even drive to the Boston campus. We take a bus.' —Cohen

Apparently, Knapp's benefits pail in comparison with the luxuries former University of New Hampshire President Eugene S. Mills received. According to UNH spokesman Mark Eicher, Mills received use of a state car, a fully furnished house on campus, heat and utilities paid for, and a full-time maid to go along with his $58,000 salary.

At the University of Vermont, President Lattie F. Corr received a gardener, along with his car, house, and salary, according to UVM News Director David Dillen.

UMass Chancellor Henry Koffler as well, apparently doesn't have to thumb to work every day. Koffler enjoys the use of a state car, staffed by a chauffer, who works sixteen hours a week, according to UMass News Director Art Clifford. Koffler receives additional monies from the UMass trust fund to pay for dinner receptions and the Chancellor's own lecture series, Clifford said. Koffler also enjoys the use of the Chancellor's house, perched atop Orchard Hill.

Clifford said the additional funding was "basically used for protocol," adding "the funding is audited by an outside auditing firm who make sure everything is legal and useful."

Carter vows to veto bills

WASHINGTON (AP) — President Carter said Thursday he will veto any legislation aimed at crippling the ability of the Federal Trade Commission to protect consumers and vowed to fight as inflationary one of Congress' pet measures — the huge water projects bill.

Carter called the FTC "one of the greatest weapons the American public has to guarantee truth and integrity and competition in the marketplace" and promised he would "not let it be picked to pieces."

Carter's pledge to veto the bill won him a standing ovation from many attending the annual convention of the Consumer Federation of America.

Voters rush to register

BOSTON (AP) — Based on last minute registrations, a lot of Massachusetts residents want to vote in the March 4 presidential primary.

"There clearly was a tremendous last-minute rush," Marcia Molay, director of the state Election Division, said yesterday. "We've been very busy the whole month of January."

She said it would be several weeks before the state office has a final count. Officials in the 351 cities and towns must send in figures to be tabulated.

Ms. Molay said there were 2.9 million registered voters in Massachusetts before the last state primary in August, 1978.

There were 3.1 million registered voters in October, 1976, just before the last presidential election.

Whether those registering this month were new voters or persons who had moved and had to re-register is unknown.

Hostages to be freed?

Iran's president attacks militants at embassy

By The Associated Press

With tough talk and stern action, President Abolhassan Bani Sadr hammered away Thursday at the U.S. Embassy militants' remaining power and prestige among the Iranian people, as reports persisted that the American hostages might be freed soon.

For the second straight day, the new Iranian president blasted the young Moslem radicals publicly, calling them "rebels against the government." And the Revolutionary Council, led by Bani Sadr, took action against them, restricting their access to national radio and television.

It appeared Bani Sadr was trying to undercut the militants' status as revolutionary heroes in preparation for a resolution of the hostage crisis being worked out behind the scenes.

A Kuwait newspaper, the weekly Al Khadaf, reported from Tehran that the release of the approximately 50 American hostages at the embassy was "imminent." The paper, which did not identify the source of its information, said the number of militants at the embassy had been reduced from 400 to 50.

It said U.N. Secretary-General Kurt Waldheim was trying to persuade Bani Sadr to "pressure the students to leave the embassy and have them replaced by regular Iranian troops."

U.S. officials were cautious in commenting on the Kuwaiti report.

Deputy Secretary of State Warren Christopher said on NBC-TV's "Today" show the situation was "somewhat promising." Spokesman George Sherman said the State Department had no evidence to confirm the report. And Hodding Carter, chief department spokesman, said, "I do not see any imminent release of the hostages."

Carter said the U.S. government was still uncertain about Iran's terms for releasing the hostages, who spent their 96th day in captivity Thursday.

Waldheim has been trying to work out an arrangement whereby an international commission would be established to investigate the alleged crimes of the deposed shah's regime, in return for release of the hostages. But U.N. officials say the timing of the release — whether it will be as the commission begins its work or after it is completed — remains unsettled.

It appeared Bani Sadr was trying to undercut the militants' status as revolutionary heroes in preparation for a resolution of the hostage crisis being worked out behind the scenes

Adding to the confusion, some Iranian officials still say they believe the hostages cannot be freed until the ousted Shah Mohammad Reza Pahlavi is returned to Iran to stand trial, which has been the militants' constant demand.

In other developments:

—The State Department said the formal application of new U.S. economic sanctions against Iran was being delayed while diplomatic efforts continued to obtain the release of the hostages.

—Panamanian President Aristides Royo was quoted by his nation's television as saying the shah can leave that country anytime he desires. Panama's foreign minister had said in a television interview that Pahlavi "cannot leave Panama for obvious reasons" and that Panama was, in effect, a jail for the ousted monarch.

Carter to support draft of women

WASHINGTON (AP) — President Carter will call for the registration of women for the military draft, White House officials said yesterday.

The White House scheduled an announcement for Friday detailing the president's plans for the entire draft registration program.

The president's proposal, disclosed by officials who asked not to be identified, is a sharp break with historical precedent. It will be the first time that a president has suggested registering women for the draft.

Carter decided to include women in the program despite a warning from House Speaker Thomas P. O'Neill that it would not pass the Congress.

The president probably will limit registration to persons 19 and 20, though full details were not made available.

Carter announced plans last month in his State of the Union messsage to resume draft registration, citing an increasing military threat from the Soviet Union.

Although he remained mum on the question of whether he would include women, but he has previously taken the position that any such program should include women.

In recent weeks, Carter's decision has been foreshadowed by statements from administration officials and the president's wife, Rosalynn, who urged registration of women.

Currently, there are about 150,000 women in the military, out of a force of more than 2 million. However, women still are banned by law from combat.

Case against Williams is FBI's strongest

By ROBERT M. ANDREWS
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The federal case against Sen. Harrison A. Williams Jr. was described yesterday as among the strongest in the FBI's political bribery investigation which has implicated eight members of Congress.

As FBI agents interviewed members of the New Jersey Casino Control Commission, which figured in the allegations against Williams, the House of Representatives turned its attention to the ethics of the manner in which the FBI conducted its 16-month inquiry.

In advance of the House floor debate, FBI Director William Webster told an Oklahoma City news conference his agency had "followed the rules of law" in its undercover operations. He denied any entrapment of members of Congress.

Allegations have been made against as many as 20 public oficials and 10 businessmen after FBI undercover agents, posing as wealthy Arabs or representatives of Arab interests, paid nearly $500,000 in cash in exchange for promises of political favors and other services.

Webster said the law allows use of deception when there is evidence of a predisposition to commit a crime. "We follow criminality," he said Wednesday. "We do not target individuals. We do not target institutions. ... We have no interest in testing any public officials.

Williams, a New Jersey Democrat, is reported to have told FBI agents on videotape that Joseph Lordi, chairman of the casino commission, helped him save $3 million for developers of the Ritz hotel-casino project in Atlantic City. Lordi and Williams have denied involvement in such a deal.

In addition, government sources said last weekend that Williams last August had accepted stock in a titanium mine in return for a promise to help obtain government contracts for a venture backed by an Arab sheik.

Officially, sources close to the investigation say all eight members of Congress remain subject to possible grand jury action, although the government considers its case against Rep. John Murtha, D-Pa., to be the weakest.

Williams was reported in The Washington Star and the New York Daily News to be a strong target for federal prosecution. Quoting unnamed Justice Department sources, the papers also listed Reps. Michael Myers, D-Pa., and Richard Kelly, R-Fla.

The Star said other strong cases were being prepared against Reps. John Jenrette, DS.C., and Raymond Lederer, DPa. Instead of those two, the Daily News listed Reps. Frank Thompson Jr., D-N.J., and John Murphy, D-N.Y., as other prime targets.

At the Capitol, Sen. Howell Heflin, D-Ala., chairman of the Senate Ethics Committee, conferred with aides to decide how hard to press the Justice Department for evidence developed in the FBI investigation.

Heflin said it is possible the committee could issue subpoenas for material it needs in pursuing its own investigation.

The committee has voted unanimously to conduct a "preliminary inquiry" into allegations against Williams.

A similar inquiry will be held on allegations against Sen. Howard Cannon, D-Nev., chairman of the Senate Commerce Committee, concerning his handling of trucking deregulation legislation and a real estate transaction in Las Vegas which Cannon acknowledged discussing with a representative of the Teamsters union. The Cannon matter is believed unrelated to the FBI bribery investigation.

Dorms:

Angry Baker residents protest, remove dorm's damaged doors

By LAURA OWENS
Special to the Collegian

Two front doors on Baker dormitory in the Central Residential Area, are no longer.

According to angry residents, who removed the doors, the action was taken to protest what they term an "insufficient security system." The residents claim the doors are broken and therefore unsafe. They say new and safe doors have been housed in Baker's basement for a year and a half, but the University has not answered demands that the faulty doors be replaced with new ones.

And the residents will not return the missing doors until their demands are met.

Area Management Coordinator Don Pelky admits that the removed doors are inadequate. Even with maintenance done on an ongoing basis, the system is still insufficient.

The basement door facing west opens readily with a hard yank, and to remedy this problem the outside handles have been removed; thereby forcing residents to enter through another door. The main entrance remains covered with plywood, Pelky said.

According to Pelky, he is doing his best to get the doors installed. The contract for the doors has been signed and the necessary hardware requested. Pelky was told that Vandupren hardware would be shipped from the manufacturer on Feb. 1, and he's currently awaiting the arrival. Having put in a request for the much needed parts quite a while ago, Pelky says he's been waiting "approximately 18 months now."

"I can initiate the process," he said, "but the rest is up to the manufacturer and the contractor. It's been suggested that we go to another company for the parts, but that would put us at the bottom of a waiting list again and would only serve to set things back further."

Pelky has received many inquiries concerning the delay of the door installations, and in response says, "The needs and the pressures of the students are clear, but my hands are tied. We are at the mercy of the manufacturer."

Pelky also stated that any action taken by students would have absolutely no affect on speeding up the delivery process of the hardware, and added that installation of the new doors is "hopefully right around the corner."

Protests halt Leach renovations

By SEAN HARVEY

Renovation of a community study lounge into office space in Leach dormitory in Northeast was suspended yesterday by the Housing Administration amid protest from Leach residents and the signing by 82 residents of a petition protesting the renovation.

The renovation was initiated by Buford Harris, Northeast/Sylvan Area Management coordinator of the Housing Office, but the residents were never informed.

"We were never told in advance about the renovation," said Leach resident Mary Anne Heft. "The carpenters just came in at 8 a.m. and started work."

The lounge is the only designated study area in the dorm and it is advertised as that in the 1979-80 Residence Hall Manual. The only other places in the dorm for the residents to study are their rooms or the main lounge, which is often occupied by groups for colloquiums.

The office space was intended for use by the Housing Administration which occupies another in the building.

Psychologist cites causes of suicides

By GARY TOBIN
Special to the Collegian

Last week a 22-year-old senior fell to his death from a dormitory in what police termed an "apparent suicide," the 20th such incident at UMass in the past 20 years.

In the 20 years between 1959 and 1979, UMass students have taken their own lives in a variety of ways: five by hanging, five by jumping, five by firearms, two by drugs, one by poisoning, one by carbon monoxide and one by stepping in front of an on-coming truck. Sixteen of the victims were male while four were female.

The causes of these deaths are complicated and hard to grasp, said Dr. David Kraft, director of the UMass Mental Health Center. Suicides can be committed because of depression, stress, or a feeling of helplessness. At times it can be two or three things coming together at once causing the victim to feel overwhelmed, Kraft said, adding that drugs and alcohol can contribute to a depressed person's suicidal tendencies.

Excess use of drugs or alcohol can lead a depressed or overly stressed person to do things that he would not normally consider, such as an impulsive leap from a building, Kraft said. He pointed out that many people stopped from committing suicide later state that they were glad they did not go through with it.

"At times," Kraft said, "the university is a pressure cooker." He cited academic, bureaucratic, social and economic pressures as the contributing factors toward student stress and depression.

Currently, UMass has a suicide rate of 6.5 per 100,000 people which is low when compared with the national average of 12 suicides per 100,000 people. "My goal is to have no suicides at UMass," said Kraft.

According to a Surgeon General report, suicide is the third leading cause of death among teenagers and young adults. The report states that the rate of suicide in the United States has increased 131 percent since 1961 within the 15 to 24 age group.

At the present time, UMass has a variety of resources available for students feeling depressed, suffering from stress or just needing someone to talk to. Kraft pointed out that there are many peer counseling services on campus, such as the Everywoman's Center, the Student Development and Counseling Center, the Veteran's Service Organization, the People's Gay Alliance and Psychological Services.

Professionally, services are available at the Mental Health Center, 127 Hills North, and UMass Health Services. The Mental Health Center has a "walk-in" service Monday through Friday from 1 to 3 p.m.

Health Services has the equivalent of a 24 hour hot line with physicians on duty around the clock, Kraft said.

"Everyone can help solve the problem," said Kraft, "students talking to students, RA's developing an awareness of student depression and stress, and even the faculty looking for warning signs."

The staff of the Mental Health Center is currently working with the staffs of the residential areas in an effort to assist and educate Heads of Residence and Residential Assistants in the early identification and warning signs of troubled students.

The Surgeon General's report states "Most suicidal persons give verbal or behavioral warning first."

Frats and sororities fight property taxes

By MARK L. CURELOP
Collegian Staff

The elimination of state property taxes for fraternities and sororities is one item that the UMass Greek community is working for this year.

According to SGA-Co-President Brian Burke, a bill has been submitted to the House and Senate. The bill would provide tax exemption for "social fraternities."

Under the proposed legislation, a social fraternity is, "any non-profit organization which has a Greek name consisting of Greek letters; which has a representative government;" and is connected with any recognized by any recognized by any educational institution.

The property tax rate for the UMass Greek area ranges from $1,796.44 to $15,087.52 per house.

Members of Beta Kappa Phi fraternity, pay the highest property tax in the UMass Greek area.

"We're an independent house," said Gary Bernson, Vice-President of Beta Kappa Phi. "We don't have a national office to help us out with rising costs. Everyting comes from the brothers of the house."

If the proposed legislation is passed, Beta Kappa Phi "could save $15,000.00 a year," said Bernson.

Burke contacted other Massachusetts Greek councils for a statewide response. "Only a few schools got back to us," Burke said.

"The money loss by the Greek area is less than the property tax aid that the town would receive if we (Greeks) were exempt from the tax," Burke said.

Robert S. Anderson, Amherst Town Assessor, said that if the bill went through, there would be "a loss of revenue."

"The fraternities are having difficulties in regards to taxes, but not major," said Anderson. "It appears that they're not fully occupied, and haven't been for some time. The cost of utilities are going up and it's difficult to live within a budget. Are taxes creating the major bulk of the problem? I'm not sure."

"Inflation coupled with food bills, electric bill, gas and rising tuition is effecting everyone," Burke said.

In the past decade, state and local taxes have more than doubled, reaching $1,180 per capita in fiscal 1979, according to an earlier Associated Press wire story.

"The fraternities and sororities should check with the Town Assessor to check their classification. If they're not listed under residential, they should appeal the town's decision and seek an abatement," Burke said.

"Property will be assessed for the upcoming year," Anderson said. "The whole Greek system has to be revaluated by the town and university."

"The property tax, re-evaluations, tui-

Black Affairs

Queen Mother Moore gives us words of wisdom and encouragement for the future in her lecture at the Campus Center last night. (Photo by Renee Mobley)

A Living Legend Visits UM

RENEE MOBLEY
Black Affairs Staff

The University was honored by the visit of a great lady and a living legend, when Queen Mother Moore spoke at the Campus Center last night.

Queen Mother came to remind us of the job that is still before all of us, the job of recreating a world that has been badly damaged by hatred, racism and greed.

She addressed herself to blacks and to whites when she called for an end to repression. She spoke of historical acts of repression but gave us present day examples as well.

The audience was reminded of an historical anti-slavery crusader, John Brown, who along with his seven sons was executed for his efforts on behalf of black people.

Other acts of repression well known to many in the audience were the brutal murders of Malcolm X, Martin Luther King and Fred Hampton.

Queen Mother informed her audience of yet another case of injustice, relatively unknown by most. The case of Lizzie Williams, a woman who received the hardest sentence in history for the crime of purjury. She was sentenced to 218 years in jail. Queen Mother pleaded her case asking that she be taken off of the wanted list. She had been in hiding after serving nine years of her sentence.

"One of the greatest acts of repression against us was to nullify our original mentality, to change us from Africans to negroes," said Queen Mother.

"I resent the fact that I do not know my own language. That was taken from me, but now I am conscious and I want it back!"

For blacks Queen Mother says that the biggest task is to restore our original mentalities, but the job is not for blacks alone. She reminds the whites in the audience that even though most of them are not to blame for the condition of our society they will receive the full weight of the wrath and the blame if they remain silent, if they do not make a conscientious effort to help rebuild the society.

When asked how she would go about these tasks Queen Mother was quite explicit. She had obviously given the matter long and careful thought. She let it be known how she would not go about it.

"All of these silly people running around talking about integration are deceiving you all," she said. You don't need integration so that every child can get a quality education. Instead Queen Mother suggested a common sense method that says if you give $50,000 to the white schools then give the same amount to the black schools.

Moore says she is opposed to busing children out of their neighborhoods and out of their communities, though she does think there should be opportunities for interaction between black and white students.

Moore is opposed to integration on the whole because she believes in the autonomy and sovereignty of the various cultures. She told the blacks in the audience "I am an African woman, a little watered down maybe," as she smiled, pointing to her caramel colored skin.

"I want to have understanding from an African not a European viewpoint; they have injured me and I want reparations for it!"

Reparations, a word that has been thrown to blacks as an empty promise since the days of reconstruction. Reparations, something that affirmative action has not yet begun to touch.

According to Queen Mother we as a race of Africans in captivity are entitled to five states to be owned and governed for and by black people. And to administer these states, not millions, not billions, but trillions of dollars are owed to blacks in reparations.

"I don't want white folks ruling over me," she said, "and I don't have any desire to rule over white folks either," she added.

Queen Mother envisions a world where all peoples of all cultures can live according to their oun legacies and their oun beliefs yet live in harmony with the other peoples of the world.

This is the message that she came to UMass to deliver to us for she says "It is all in your hands."

Food for Thought

The history of leadership in the UMass Black community has changed. In fact, during the last thirteen years, we have gone from an academic-financial system to the recognition of a Black fraternity and sorority unit. Thus, the changes have provided a new focus, that we can not overlook.

The continuous deterioration of the inner cities, the movements for Civil and Human rights, and the conflict abroad, had opened the doors for a number of reforms. The Black community at UMass was instrumental in sustaning programs that had a solid base.

The Collegiate Committee for the Education of Black Students (CCEBS) is one example of this base. The CCEBS program was developed to provide Black and other students in admission, financial aid, and tutorial assistance. Even with a history of seven different administrations, financial cutbacks, and etc., it still provides remedial assistance for its present students.

The Black Studies department was built with strong student backing, to implement historical, political, and educational contributions of Blacks throughout the world.

The, crucial success for Black student awareness came with the development of student organizations like Harambee, Afro Am Arikan, and Drum. Through these programs the students were able to communicate, and provide a future direction for the 70's.

Unlike the leadership provided by CCEBS, Black Studies Depts., Black Cultural Center, Afro Am, Drum, and Harambee, the 1970's climax represented a different period. The increasing population of Black and other Third World Students brought a new dimension to the accomplishment of old goals. First, there was the constant disagreement of direction between students and administrators. Second, individual pockets of the Black Student population felt the need to sustain their own ideas. Third, the continuous support and influence of students in the area (Amherst, Smith, Mt. Holyoke and Hampshire) provided another outlet for ideas and direction. Thus, the combination of the three brought on four different leadership groups.

During the early 70's the influence of the Black Studies dept. was still being tested. But the split in the faculty-student relationship brought on the development of the communication components like the Black Mass Communication Project and Nummo News.

The second period was a continuation of conflict and the click system. In the time span from 1972-1976, the Black student organization list went from five to over fifteen groups, the Center for Racial Understanding, Asian Americans Ass., Third World Scientist, Black Psychology, Third World Center on the Hill, Bilingual Collegiate Program Slyvan area, Coolidge, Kennedy, John Adams and the Malcolm X Center, WEBD and Third World Women Centers were set up.

The blossoming of organization brought on the need for coordination. The third period involved the resurfacing of the Black Cultural Center. Basically, the structure imposed by the BCC was the New Africa House Steering Committee, but because of the lack of confidence and responsibility, a new position was created in the mid-70's.

The Third World Coordinator, (Office of Third World Affairs), was formed to coordinate, and disseminate information about Black and other Third World groups at UMass and the Five College area. The creation of this position was a plus, in assisting the New Africa House Cultural Center and the Black Program Coornators in Recognized Student Organization Office. The Organizer was also influential into the fourth movement of groups in the seventies. The final group of influence was the creation of the Third World Caucus. The Caucus was utilized as a watchdog for the Black community.

In summation, the focus of the groups has changed over time because of the different idealogies among the community and it's organizers and the changes brought about by the UMass system.

In 1980, we have the potential for a new area. The exposure of the Black fraternity and sorority in the Student Ballroom last Saturday should emphasize the potential of these groups. The association of negative elements, initiation procedures, and separation from the general community were not a part of the Saturday event. Because the groups are based on the environment at UMass, there should be high expectation for future recruits.

Olver attacks WEMCO on rate increase

By MARC FAGELSON
Collegian Staff

A proposed $27 million rate hike by the Western Massachusetts Electric Co. promises to raise more than just tuition rates here at the University, an aide to State Senator John W. Olver said yesterday.

Brad Goverman, Olver's aide and a former UMass student, explained the proposed hike represents an increase of 25 percent for the residential sector. The commercial and industrial rates would increase 11 percent he added.

In a Feb. 5 public hearing, Senator Olver spoke out against the proposed hike saying, "It is socially irresponsible, and while it may look like good short term company policy, in the long run the corporation's interest cannot be well served if public and social interest are being violated."

Much of the increase stems from WMECO's proposed construction of the Millstone III nuclear power plant, Goverman said. The utility owns a 65 percent interest in the plant and believes the 140 megawatts generated by the plant is necessary to serve its customers according to their report submitted to the Department of Public Utilities.

The hike is unfair for a number of reasons, Goverman contends. WMECO has included in their rate base—the projected cost of generating and transmitting energy to customers as well as covering the costs of dividends for stock holders—an item calling for the cost of decommisioning obsolete nuclear plants.

It has not yet been determined whether the utility has the right to include such a cost and pass it on to their paying customers, yet decommisioning costs do appear on their fiscal statement, Goverman said.

The utility is also trying a new accounting

Groups for legislative reforms to meet before hearings reopen

By RICHARD NAGLE
Collegian Staff

Before the Special Commission Concerning State and County Building reopens its hearings on February 20, a formal meeting of groups suppporting the Commission's legislative reforms will be held next Thursday.

The Special Commision, called the Ward Commission, after its chairman, former Amherst College President Dr. John Ward, is to begin hearing testimony concerning corruption in state building practices.

The groups comprise an informal coalition organized by Student Center for Educational Research and Advocacy advisor Evan Johnston. Johnston, former 14-year member of the UMass Building Authority, has brought together members of nine organizations including the League of Women Voters, Massachusetts Teachers Association, Common Cause and others to lobby for the legislation.

"We have to see the legislation all the way down the hall, literally, as it goes through the state house," Johnston said. Staff members of the commission have already begun contacting legislators to discuss support for what Johnston called, "the most important legislation since the state constitution."

Johnston said that the reforms not only cover state management of public construction but also affect any state funded project.

Representatives of SCERA and the UMass Legal Services Office are to meet with members of the coalition and Chairman Ward next Thursday to discuss the legislation, its ramifications, and support for the extensive reforms.

The commission's December report proposed "a total reorganization of the management of public construction in Massachusetts."

The coalition aims to provide for specific mention of all state authorities, particularly building authorities, in the package.

The state authorities, including the Massachusetts Turnpike Authority, and UMass Building Authority, are presently autonomous of state control. Johnston said that though they should remain as such the authorities should be subject to the guidelines laid down by the commisssion. "If the authorities can't or won't follow the guidelines they should be incorporated into another state agency," he added.

Pinto not modified to save $ — Ford official

By LISA LEVITT
Associated Press Writer

WINAMAC, Ind. (AP) — Ford Motor Co.'s Pinto subcompact could have been modified for $6.65 per car to withstand rear-end collisions at 30 mph without fire risk, a former Ford executive testified Thursday in the automaker's reckless homicide trial.

Instead, top company officials decided against correcting defects in Pinto fuel tanks to save money, said Harley Copp, an engineer who was a Ford vice president for European operations and later was in charge of crash tests at Ford's Dearborn, Mich., headquarters.

Ford is charged with reckless homicide in the August 1978 deaths of three young women in a 1973 Pinto sedan that exploded when hit from behind by a van near Goshen, Ind.

The state contends that Ford knew Pinto fuel tanks were likely to explode in rear-end collisions but sold the cars anyway without making repairs or warning the public.

The trial ended its fifth week Thursday, and chief prosecutor Michael A. Cosentino said he expected to wrap up his case next week.

Copp, the key prosecution witness, told the Pulaski Circuit Court jury the 1973 Pinto was designed to withstand a 20 mph rear-end crash involving a 4,000-pound vehicle.

Copp said that in August 1969, at a product strategy meeting with then-Ford President Lee A. Iacocca and other Ford executives, a proposal to increase the safety standard to 30 mph was rejected "because of cost and ensuing problems."

Bertolucci films: startling contrast

By CANDYCE CARLON
Collegian Staff

Bernardo Bertolucci's Luna is perhaps the most unsubtle film of 1979. Bertolucci provides the viewer with a marketable American actress (Jill Clayburgh) a provocative theme, and numerous psychological and visual metaphors. These qualities almost demand that the film succeed, but the director's message becomes convoluted in the formula.

I assume that with Luna, Bertolucci was exploring the artistic personality in much the same way he looked at the character of a facist in The Conformist (1970). This earlier film exposed the underlying decadence of Mussolini's regime through Marcello Clerici's (Jean-Louis Trintignant) assasination of a professor and his wife. Clerici's repressed homosexuality attracts him to the male-identified facists although his political beliefs are purely opportunistic.

Review

Bertolucci uses flashbacks to reveal Clerici's guilt concerning the death of his mother's chauffeur, who was his childhood lover. The flashbacks are skillfully triggered by visual reminders in Clerici's present. The technique allows the viewer to absorb pieces of Clerici's present. The technique allows the viewer to absorb pieces of Clerici's psyche slowly, making the events of the assasination highly perscnal and emotional, although Clerici remains outwardly brutal and unemotional.

The Conformist presents a particularly limited view of women under facism. Clerici's wife Giulia and the professor's wife, Anna Quadri, are extremes of female stereotypes. Guilia is a passive, kitchen-and-bedroom wife who is completely unaware of her surroundings or how she is being used sexually. Anna Quadri (Dominique Sanda) is decisevely aware politically and personally; she is the manipulator and seducer of both Clerici and Guilia; she knows that Clerici's mission is to murder her husband, and confronts him with the knowledge. Anna's limitation is her position on the periphery of her husband's anti-facist and intellectual activities because she is a woman.

The protagonist of Luna has less depth of character than the women in The Conformist. Clayburgh, as an operatic star attempting to balance her career, a move to Italy, her son's (Matthew Barry) heroin addiction and her recent widowing, appears more confused than troubled. She is Bertolucci's vehicle to portray the perversion of the life of an artist, but she seems to expend more energy pursuing a sexual adventure with her son than pursuing her art.

Within the opening moments of the film, Bertolucci introduces the first of the trite symbolism employed in Luna. Clayburgh's infant son is entangled in a vertual umbilical cord of yarn attached to his grandmother. The metaphor is unfortunately repeated later in the film during a scene between the same grandmother and the boy's father. Further atrocities include the son stealing and walking in his father's shoes and another scene in which the boy discos his heart out to "Night Fever," obviously a dig at the decadent American youth culture. The moon, which appears frequently and should be the film's central metaphor, is actually a rather enigmatic symbol. It bears no relation to the characters and adds nothing to the viewer's understanding of the situation. It is disappointing that Bertolucci would title this film Luna and never interpret the symbol, while at the same time making metaphors of lesser importance blatantly clear.

Bertolucci has also pulled out a stock lesbian character, the opera star's manager, to add to the sexual confusion, as well as a senile opera mentor to add to the general confusion. Clayburgh is completely lost among the supporting characters and it is particularly apt that she wanders aimlessly in an enormous crowd of singers during a rehearsal, near the end of the film. Her character did not seem to know what she was doing there. I wonder if Clayburgh knew.

Despite the abundant flaws of Luna, Bertolucci is a exceptional director and because of the fine cinematography of the film, Luna is visually satisfying. The finely woven telling of The Conformist and Luna's loosely connected metaphors make a startling contrast of the work of this director.

The Conformist and Luna will be playing Sunday through Tuesday at Amherst Cinema.

WSYL-TV now operating again

By LAUREL HANSCOM
Special to the Collegian

A variety of public service and entertainment programs is once again available to Sylvan residents thanks to a student-run television station on cable channel 2, WSYL-TV.

Last semester the station's video tape recorder broke down and limited WSYL to broadcating only live programming. Now, however, the recorder has been repaired and a wide range of programs are being planned for this semester.

The station will broadcast for two or three hours a night, for at least two nights a week. The Union Video Center, a production and media center staffed by both professionals and students, will provide WSYL with the majority of its programs. One future show being planned is "Sylvan Night Live" based on NBC's "Saturday Night Live" comedy show, said interim station manager Steve Rybicki.

Editorial/Opinion

Human lives most vital of vital interests

BILL HALLISEY

Stockpiling nuclear weapons has accomplished one thing: It has made nuclear war so potentially catastrophic that no sane group of human beings would ever consider taking the initiative in one. But we have overlooked one nasty consequence of all we have done. Nuclear proliferation has merely reopened the door to conventional warfare.

The Soviets were on the ball. They have a well trained army, enough transport planes and vehicles to relocate the entire country, and a bunch of tanks that make most of ours look like 1969 Ford Pintos. Yes, the Russians are prepared to fight the good old fashioned way and we, unfortunately, are not.

So the Administration looked down upon its all volunteer Army and, seeing that it was hopelessly inadequate, proclaimed, "We have looked down upon our Army and concluded that it is lousy, therefore we shall impose a registration for the draft throughout the land in order to frighten the Ruskies and make it easier to mobilize if the need ever arises." And there was much grumbling and divided opinion amongst the multitudes.

Which brings me to my point...

Many of you are conjuring up devious little plans like moving to Canada, applying for CO status, getting pregnant, or cutting off your trigger finger. Consider this first:

When you were just a twinkle in your father's eye he was enlisting in the service because he realized that what he had was well worth fighting for. We live in one of the most wealthy, tolerant, and benevolent nations in the world and every generation before ours had to pay with its own sweat and blood to make it that way. But no, not us. We are obviously more intelligent and conscientious than our forefathers were.

The seventies has produced a contingent of selfish, holier-than-thou cowards who would rather see someone else do their fighting for them. The situation in the Middle East is not comparable to the situation in Vietnam. The interests of the entire free world may be at stake.

Canada won't appreciate your parasitic presence any more than this country will when you come begging for readmittance. You will be damned to a life of guilt and self hatred. We have a responsibility to ourselves as well as the generation whose seed we contain. Let's not forget that.

On the other hand...

Many of you are prepared to pack right up and head for boot camp as soon as your draft notice arrives. Consider this first:

Have you allowed yourself to become so conditioned by patriotic administrative rhetoric that you have lost sight of the reality of the situation? We are merely pawns in a paranoid game between two schizophrenic superpowers. So afraid are they of each other's intentions that they make killing one another seem like the only means of alleviating those fears.

Oh sure, the United States has vital interests in the Middle East; interests that have nothing to do with love for humanity or the value of human life, interests that are determined largely by fat politicians and corporate presidents who fear their system of wasteful extravagance may be heading toward change. They will not fight and neither will their sons and daughters.

War, in case you haven't realized, means killing people and being killed. It means leveled cities, torture, headless friends, and little babies getting blown up into itty bitty bloody bits. It means coming home a quadraplegic and realizing you lost the use of your limbs for nothing except that gas guzzler in the garage that you can't drive now anyhow.

Go to war like the mindless, Pavlovian killer dog that you are. I'll have about as much sympathy for you as I would for a...a draft evader.

Student fee: Who should control

YOUR VOICE

STEVE KLEIN

Your Student Government Association and your administration are presently grappling over control of student money; specifically, the million and one half dollars collected annually from the students through the line fee on the school bill entitled, Student Activities Tax Fund (SATF).

A document, coined the "Field Document," after Dean of Students William F. Field, lies close to the heart of the issue. It deals primarily with claims of past wrongdoing within the realm of the Student Government Association.

The SGA is fighting hard to retain control of the money. The administration would like to see the money channeled through the University accounting system instead.

The administration claims this would instate accountability. The students claim this is an attempt to destroy student empowerment.

This week's random telephone sampling of student consensus dealt with this issue: Put simply, who should control student money?

Thomas Cayer of McNamara Dormitory, a second semester freshman, believes as long as there is some sort of "checks and balances system," he much prefers that control remains in student hands.

Communication Studies major Joe Grein, an 18-year-old freshman from Coolidge Dormitory said, "To tell the truth, I'm only a freshman—I couldn't tell you what I think."

Grein was not alone: Over half the responses rang similar.

David Alter, 18, said, "Of course I'd side with the students." David wondered what the administration wants to do with the money, anyway. He said the administration is not as in touch with the students as is the SGA.

Business management major Diane Ayoub said she has to side with the students. Ayoub, a 20-year-old resident of Moore House Dormitory said, "The administration has enough policies and control in their own areas. I think they (SGA members) are pretty honest, with the students' best interests in mind."

Jeff Glynn, a chemistry major who resides in Webster Dormitory asked, "What evidence do they (the administration) have?" Glynn said he has "faith" in the SGA and he thought the whole thing was "pretty ridiculous."

A first year exchange student, Kim Driskell, from the Univeristy of Nevada at Las Vegas said that although she doesn't know that much about it she wonders, "Why would they (the administration) suggest it if they don't have grounds for it—the guy (Field) said 'I want everybody to take a good look at it and then we'll talk.'" Kim, 20, does not feel the administration wants to take power from the students without any basis or reason.

Maureen Duffy, a resident of Wheeler Dormitory said she believes the student government is closer to the students than the administration. Maureen, a journalism major, when asked how she felt about the administration accounting for student monies said, "I wouldn't want to see it."

Banner theft means oppression expected

To the Editor:

Surprise! I wish to report that homophobia is alive and well at UMASS-Amherst. Tuesday Night, a People's Gay Alliance banner was stolen from the railing at The Student Union Building. The poor sheet, whose only crime was to have our name on it, has been abducted to who knows where. As the first official act against the P.G.A. this year we've begun with a great (sic) start. The Eighties have arrived. And with them comes yet another decade of oppression.

Kevin George
People's Gay Alliance

Letters Policy

Letters to the editor should be kept as short as possible, preferably no longer than two pages. They should be typed at 67 characters per line, triple-spaced.

All letters should contain the author's name, address, and telephone number for verification. Telephone numbers will not be printed.

To the Editor:

We are glad to see the Collegian giving future New York Daily News reporters their professional starts, but the lead story of 2/5/80 on rats in the Student Union Building really made Earthfoods sound like the rat haven of the University.

By starting the second paragraph with the words "The rat infestation of Earthfoods," the reporter created the image of rats dancing around in our wok and rolling aound in our oats. Although the reporter did quote George Ried, head of the Environmental Health and Safety, saying that Earthfoods was cleared to open, in addition to quoting one of our collective members stating that we have "rat proofed" our kitchen...we all know that most people don't read past the second paragraph of a news story.

Earthfoods collective members, in unhesitantly volunteering information about the rat problem, have led to the interpretation that Earthfoods is at the center of the problem.

The rats in the SUB and Campus Center are a problem of both the Campus Center Administration and Food Services located in those buildings. Earthfoods has done it's part in ridding the problem, now the other food services and the administration have to do theirs.

In concluding, we feel a great disservice has been done to Earthfoods by misleading our customers to believe that we run an unsanitary operation.

Women's Center forms labor task force

By LINDA PLAUT
Collegian Staff

A new Everywoman's Center group, The Working Women's Task Force, has been started after UMass faculty members aided women strikers from WESCO Electronics, a small electrical components plant in Greenfield.

The 20 week-old strike ended Wednesday night when members of Local 274, United Electrical Radio and Machine Workers of America (U.E.) voted to ratify their first-ever contract.

Karen Eichstaedt-West, Everywoman's Center employment counselor and members of the UMass labor and economics departments tried to raise money for the strikers, solicited food donations, politically educated the women, and joined the picket line. In addition, a benefit was held at Earthfoods where Eichstaedt-West sang folk songs and played guitar.

Workers first voted to seek union representation three years ago, but the company bitterly opposed the unionization at every step, seeking labor board and court decisions.

According to Ralph Gordon, Union Bureau Chief, the two-year contract calls for a 50 cent an hour increase across the board the first year, and 40 cents the second year, with 11 paid holidays, changes in insurance and sick leave plans, agreement by the company to drop the merit plan, and a union security clause.

Many of the 90 women employed at WESCO worked there for 10 or 20 years earning wages that ranged from minimum to $4.20 an hour. Job benefits were essentially non-existent, according to a Valley Women's Voice article of November, 1979. There were no paid sick days at WESCO. Overtime was mandatory. The company could call for work on holidays. There was no accident or sickness insurance.

There were no guaranteed pay raises at WESCO because a merit system was used as a wage guide. Bob Kugell, owner of this one-man operation, also favored and advanced only those women who were friendly toward him, and the large majority of women who gained merits were his relatives or family friends. Pro-union women who tried to organize other members in the shop were denied merits, the article said.

According to Alex Markley, U.E. Field Organization, the two-year contract did not give WESCO employees all they wanted, but it was the best they could do at the time.

The Working Women's Task Force will have its first meeting at the Everywoman's Center, Wilder Hall on February 13 at 7 p.m. All women are welcome who have an interest in any issues relevant to women in the workplace. There are many issues the Task Force may discuss, including women's rights on the job, sex and race discrimination, job safety and health, day care, job benefits, sexual harassment and stress on the job.

Eichstaedt-West said she would ultimately like to see the Working Woman's Task Force form an organization and become active in aiding oppressed workers and strikers.

procedure which, if implemented, would account for $8 to 9 million of the proposed $27 million increase, Goverman added. Rather than base their estimated cost on a test year, as they have done in the past, the utility is projecting costs of their own for a future best year, he said.

The procedure is complicated, and was barred recently by the DPU, Goverman said, but the cost of implementing it raises the utility's proposed increase close to 25 percent.

WMECO's proposed rate hike is particularly unfair to the members of the residential sector, Goverman added. Because the residential sector is most concerned with energy conservation, their disproportionate rate increase is, as Senator Olver said, "socially irresponsible."

Stompers to appear at the Blue Wall

The Stompers,recently voted by Boston Globe readers as the Number One new band of that city, are scheduled to perform their dynamic rock and roll show Saturday night at the Blue Wall.

With the support of WBCN and WCOZ (two Boston FM outlets the band came into their own last year. The group has been headlining at Boston's Paradise, Lynn's Harbor House, and various other local clubs in the Hub area, drawing enthusiastic SRO crowds.

The populace of the Pioneer valley is indeed treated to a standout band this weekend. Thrill to the throbbing beat of American Fun and to the inspiring melodies of Anymore. Sal, Cooch, Steve and Dave will be one of the highlights of this semester. If you don't like the Stompers you don't like rock and roll.....''You just better believe this is rock and roll.'' -- David A. Segal

At a news conference Thursday, Kelly elaborated on his contention that he took $25,000 in cash Jan. 8 from some suspicious persons — whom he later learned were FBI agents — because he was conducting his own investigation of wrongdoing. Kelly returned most of the money to the FBI on Sunday.

Kelly criticized the press and charged that the FBI had "placed me and my family in jeopardy." He said he did not expect to be indicted because his intent was not to take a bribe but to investigate the bribers.

Sylvan Area Government co-President David Cline said he urged the student body to get involved. "If people have any unusual ideas for programming, bring them down because that's just the kind of thing we're looking for."

Cline said student participation is needed to keep the station going and input is needed from people who want their opinions voiced on current issues.

Last year WSYL broadcast a debate between Student Government Association presidential candidates and Cline said the station will continue along the line of providing public service programming for the UMass community.

Funding for the station is provided by the Sylvan Area Government. The money goes towards the station's equipment which includes two video cameras, one video tape deck and audio and lighting equipment. Currently there is an opening for the paid position of station manager.

"It is incredibly easy to get involved in a station like this because it's so easy to run," Rybicki said.

No experience is necessary to join, he said, and interested students wishing to get involved with WSYL-TV can call 545-3850 or drop by the station located in the basement of Cashin dormitory.

Board of Governors urges Nestle boycott

By MARYANNE MICCHELLI
Collegian Staff

The Campus Center Board of Governors last night moved to support a boycott of the Nestle Company and endorsed the removal of all Nestle products and subsidiary products from the Campus Center/Student Union complex.

Nestle, the world's largest producer of infant formulas, has been accused of aiding an epidemic of malnutrition and infection in the third world.

Nestle products, which in addition to those bearing the Nestle name, include Libby's, Crosse and Blackwell, L'Oreal, and Rusty Scupper Restaurants are widely consumed by students at UMass, according to Curtise Wahlens, chair of the board's operations committee.

Wahlens said removal of Nestle Products from the Campus Center would be part of a large movement to "alert the University community to practices which Nestle has been conducting."

Wahlens referred to the issue as a "well-known on this campus."

Williams Harris, director of the Campus Center, added that he advised "putting it into the educational plan rather than just boycutting products."

In other action last night, the board moved to oppose construction of a mini-store on the Campus Center concourse, and approved new prices for pizza and grinders now being served by Campus Center Food Services.

Spikers in action

The men's volleyball team opens its home season Saturday when it hosts Harvard and Northeastern Universities at NOPE gym. The matches begin at 2:00 p.m.

Harvard is the defending New England Collegiate Volleyball League champion, while Northeastern finished second at the championships last year. Both teams played at the Jamboree at UNH last week, along with UMass, which compiled a 3-3 record. At the Jamboree, UMass lost to the Crimson and defeated Northeastern.

In order to prepare for the tri-match, the team has been concentrating on overall offense, with particular emphasis on setting.

"We've been using a certain set during the past few weeks," said coach Al Morel, "this set frees our middle blocker. We used this against teams in the Jamboree, and Jim Grosslein did a very good job blocking the middle. We are practicing this set as well as a "1" set, which freezes the middle blocker."

After the tri-match, UMass will travel to West Point for a Monday afternoon match with the Cadets.

Swimmers better but still lose

By SCOTT SOLOMON
Collegian Staff

It was a different kind of defeat.

In dropping a 72-41 decision to UConn Wednesday night, the UMass men's swim team showed one thing. That it could compete.

It has been difficult for the Minutemen to keep up with the scholarship—infested teams this season, the two biggest being Tufts and Boston University. As a result, their 79-80 season mark has fallen to 1—4.

But things seemed to take shape Wednesday, as UMass established not a remarkable display of swimming heroics, but certainly a solid one.

The mermen registered five first place spots, which is their most successful output in that department in four of five meets.

The high point for UMass was, of course, its performance in the diving events. Dan Anthony simply blew the house apart, as he scored a 224.30 in the one—meter and a 252.30 in the three—meter board to sweep the competition. Anthony's mark in the latter was his second highest total this season.

Tom Dundon, Dave Stevens, and John Mulvaney each broke out of their one meet mini—slumps with victories in the 100—yard freestyle, the 200—yard breaststroke, and the 200—yard backstroke respectively.

Ted Candiloro came away with an impressive second place finish in the 200—yard butterfly (2:11.46), as he squeaked past UConn's Dave Johnson.

The mermen will have their work cut out for them in the weeks ahead, as they leave for four consecutive road meets before coming back on February 21 to face Amherst College. Tomorrow afternoon UMass will square off against Vermont at 2:00 p.m.

Sue Peters: On the top of women's hoop

By DANNY GUIDERA
Collegian Staff

In these days of speciality, it is rare to find an athlete who plays two sports at the collegiate level (a la Ronnie Perry of Holy Cross), let alone play them with the skill of basketball and softball superstar Sue Peters, who some have advanced as a candidate for the greatest athlete ever to come out of UMass.

It seems like it is getting to be a habit with Sue Peters. Last year at this time the UMass basketball superstar became the first woman in the history of the program to net 1000 career points. When she hit a baseline jumper early in the second quarter of last month's game against St. John's, she became the all-time leading scorer in the history of UMass basketball breaking the old record held by Mike Pyatt with 1503.

"I'm definitely proud," said Peters, "it's a big accomplishment." However she said that she was not aware of the record until a few days before the game.

"It seemed like everyone else knew about it except me," she said, "I didn't realize it until Steve Lefferson, assistant coach) told me."

In addition to Peters' basketball exploits it should not be overlooked that she is a star softball player also. She has a career record of 27-2-1 as a pitcher and a lifetime batting average of .372. Peters, who also plays outfield, has led the team in stolen bases in every year that she played and she hit .428 as a sophomore, leading the team in homers.

The 5'7" senior guard from Southbridge (where she scored more than 1800 points in her high school playing days) is currently leading the Minutewomen with a 20.2 points per game average. Last year she led the women cagers in hitting 23.4 points per game.

In this her final season, the woman who holds most every major offensive record in the UMass woman's basketball program, looks to the future.

Sue Peters

"I'd like to play pro," Peters said. She added that although she was not resentful that she does not have the same opportunities to find fame and fortune in the pro ranks that men have.

"Not resentful. Disappointed is more the word. I'm disappointed that women don't have the same outlets after college as men do. It's sad to think that it's all over after graduation. You grow up playing basketball, going to practice, playing in games and then one day you graduate and it's all over. That's just too much to cut away from."

Peters said that in the future she would like to go into coaching at the collegiate level or teach. The Physical Education major, who is a Dean's List student recently completed her student teaching at Northampton High.

Although Peters started off the season slow, she has regained her form to once again take the team lead in scoring with recent efforts of 22 against Bishop's University of Canada, 20 against Providence, 21 against Boston University and 29 against the University of Rhode Island.

"For a while (in the beginning of the season) we had a problem with leadership," said Peters. "No one would really take control of the team. As a co-captain I should have."

"I've tried to become more of a steadying influence," Peters said. "I've got to do that job the best way I know how. We have more talent on this team than any year before. My part is to motivate the team."

Before her basketball career at UMass ends, Peters said she would love to fulfill a career-long dream by leading the Minutewomen into the Nationals, a goal the team has yet to achieve. Regardless of whether she attains her goal, Peters' illustrious career here will be long remembered.

Matmen pin Wildcats

By DONNA SULLIVAN
Collegian Staff

The Wildcats walked into Boyden gym Wednesday night and handed the matmen their tenth victory of the season before any wrestlers stepped onto the mat. UNH came armed with just six wrestlers (ten compose a team) and UMass chalked up 24 forfeit points on its way to a 48-3 whipping of UNH. points on its way to a 48-3 whipping of UNH.

According to UNH Head Coach Jim Erquhart the New Hampshire wrestling squad has been plagued with injuries and is suffering recruiting problems. "One guy has a broken leg and another just had a stomach operation," the first-year coach said.

Of six matches held, UMass was successful in all but one, 167 pound Dave McEntee fell to Chet Davis who placed second in the Coast Guard Tourney held early in December.

In the 126 pound class, UMass' Brian O'Boyle started working John Boghos early in the match, starting the scoring off with a two point take down in the first period. O'Boyle kept on Boghos, chalking up eleven points before threatening with a pin with one minute remaining in the bout.

Time ran out on 190 pound Bill McQuade. With five seconds left in the second period, McQuade had Phil Voss, back down on the mat and the buzzer sounded before Voss' scapular hit bottom to make it a legal pin.

McQuade continued working Voss in the third, taking him down with a front headlock and pinning him one minute into the third period.

Joe LaCosse knocked the wind out of heavyweight John Allen and slowed him down a bit, but failed to ruin Allen's perfect season. Before he was through, Allen had scored 22 points to LaCosse's seven for a five point superior decision.

Tonight the matmen travel to Springfield College for a 7:30 meet. "Springfield is well coached; the same guy has been there for 30 years," UMass assistant Coach Dave Foxen said, "It is a big phys. ed. school and they have some wrestling scholarships, but they're not as tough as Rhode Island."

Results: UMass 48, UNH 3; 118 Sizzi UM won by forfeit; 126 O'Boyle UM Dec. Boghos UNH 15-3; 134 Doug Johnson UM won by forfeit; 142 Greg Macdonald UM Dec. McAllister UNH 12-4; 150 Bryan Fawcett UM Dec. Brophy UNH 10-2; 158 Mike Carroll UM won by forfeit; 167 Davis UNH Dec. McEntee UM 8-2; 177 Clark UM won by forfeit; 190 McQuade UM Pinned Voss UNH 6:00; Hwt. Allen UM Dec. Lacosse UNH 22-7.

Cagers play league powerhouse Villanova

By JONATHAN HAMILTON
Collegian Staff

Just when things were looking a bit brighter for the Minutemen this past weekend with their first win over Harvard, they must now take on a powerful Villanova squad sporting a 16-5 record. When UMass does take the floor against the Wildcats at the Cage tomorrow night at 7:30, it will still probably feel the sobering effects of a 73-55 trouncing at the hands of UConn Wednesday.

With that loss to the Huskies, their won loss record dropped to a staggering 1-17. What also will be on the Minutemen's minds Sat. night will be the thrashing they took by this same Villanova team Jan.9th, 92-59. This is the same team that lost close decisions to Notre Dame (70-69), at South Bend and St. Johns (81-75) both nationally ranked teams. They lost also the Syracuse, 92-84 currently ranked No. 2 in the country.

The Cats are led by 6'7" freshman forward John Pinone who is averaging 15.1 points a game. Alex Bradley, a forward, is second on the team in scoring with a 12.4 average. Ted Wolff, Villanova Sports Information Director is very impressed with Pinone. "When a freshman leads a team in both scoring and rebounding you know what kind of asset he is to the team. He will easily be the rookie of the year in the Eastern Eight." Wolff also mentioned guard Rory Sparrow. "He is playing the best point guard for us in many years. He beat George Washington at the buzzer with a fifteen-footer 74-72, Wednesday night. " Wolff hoped the Wildcats will jump out early and maintain the lead. "All the Villanova players know the Cage and how difficult it is to play in it," he said.

UMass on the other hand will try to play as an unit as it did so effectively against Harvard. The playing status of George Dennerlein will be in question as he is suffering from an impacted wisdom tooth. UMass will make its first appearance in the Cage since Jan. 5 when it was defeated by Rutgers 76-70.

Women's basketball coach Mary Ann Ozdarski set only one goal for this, her fourth season at Massachusetts: to be the number one team in New England. After a three week absence, the Minutewomen are back atop the New England college poll.

"We're playing really good now," Ozdarski said, "but we can play better."

With recent wins over previously top-ranked Providence College and previously unbeaten Bishop's University of Canada, UMass has regained the top spot that it lost January 14. At the time, the 11-6 Minutewomen were in the midst of a three-game losing streak.

But things are looking up now for a team that started out losing the services of a top player in Maura Supinski. With the area's top ranking and the pleasure of riding a five-game winning streak, the natural progression is to the playoffs.

"At this point in the year you can't help but think about it," Ozdarski said. "But our players aren't too concerned with the polls. We have to think about each game as they come."

The second formidable opponent in the current three-game homestand is Northeastern tomorrow at 3 p.m. at Curry Hicks Cage. Northeastern is one of those squads that, despite posting a rather mediocre record of 7-7, can be a thorn in the side of some of the area's better teams. Led by top-scorer Beth Peterson (19 points per game) the Huskies tripped up St. John's 71-69 last Sunday. The St. John's Express beat UMass by 11 on January 6.

"They will be tough," Ozdarski said. "They're believers; they believe they can beat us. They are playing good basketball."

NOTES—Sophomore guard Sherry Collins is still nursing her back which was injured against UNH. She is still not practicing but should return soon...Tara Heinzmann, out of last week's game with Bishop's because of the flu, will return to the line-up tomorrow...

Trackmen to Maine; Relay to Millrose

By JANE WOLFSON
Collegian Staff

While the UMass indoor track team is trudging to Orono, Maine tonight for a dual meet with the Black Bears tomorrow afternoon, the Minutemen two-mile relay team will be in Madison Square Garden to compete in the 93rd annaul Millrose Games, the most prestigious indoor track event.

Running in the relay for UMass will be, at lead-off, tri-captain Mickey Baugh, second leg, tri-captain Steve MacDougall (participating in his third Millrose Games); third led Rick Walls; and running the anchor leg will be sophomore Paul Beaulieu.

Competing against UMass in the race will be Fordham College (who narrowly beat out the Minutemen in the two-mile relay race at the New England AAU's at Harvard two weekends ago), North Carolina, Duke, Farleigh Dickinson, St. John's, and William and Mary.

Two years ago the Minutemen captured the two-mile event and last year finished fifth overall with the team of MacDougall, Baugh, junior Bob Martin, and Bob Hunt who graduated last May.

"This is the premiere indoor track event," said Coach Ken O'Brien of the Millrose Games. "Only the top runners will be there. How we'll do depends on how well everyone runs, we could finish fifth or sixth but we do have the potential to win."

Meanwhile, a close meet is expected in Orono again this year. The Black Bears narrowly defeated the Minutemen last year, 67-65. Crucial events for UMass include the shotput, where Stephen Hyder and Kirk Skinner are expected to go neck-and-neck with the throwers from Maine. The 60-yard dash should see Minuteman sprinter Bill DeVarney clash with Maine's Kevin Tarr, who currently holds the fastest time in New England, 6.2 seconds.

Junior Paul King, with a time of 7.7 holds the edge for the hurdles. Strong showings from King and DeVarney in the long jump, and outstanding performances for Jim Larabee and Jay Buckley in the pole-vault will be needed.

The mile run will be critical. UMass is expecting stong performances from sophomore John Caffrey and senior Jay Legere.

Library reopens

DAVID KELLOGG
Special to the Collegian

Beginning today, UMass's 26-story library will be open to anyone with Five College identification, but "direct access" will be limited to 500 people daily on a first-come basis, it was announced Friday. Entrance will be through the side near the Campus Pond.

"I am naturally delighted," Chancellor Henry Koffler said yesterday. "We started the semester with the horrible news that the library had to be closed. It was the worst decision I ever had to make."

Koffler refused comment on a report soon to be released from the state Attorney General's office concerning the library.

The library's card catalog, reference, and reserve services remain in Goodell Library, reference librarian Paula Mark said. Users outside the Five College network will need a pass to get into the tower, she said.

"The notion that we are in a more normal pattern will attract more people," Mark said. This is the first time since the tower's September 1979 closing it has been directly open to all undergraduates.

The building was closed and services were moved out of the tower when bricks from the facade continued to chip off, iindicating parts of the facade could fall.

Mark said that while there has been no definitive statement on the resolution of this problem or who is responsible, officials feel such an accident unlikely.

Direct access will eliminate the need for having books paged, the librarian said. This paging was done largely by student assistants who will be reassigned.

The 500 person limit is based on seating capacity, reference Librarian Virginia Tunnell explained. "The study space has certainly decreased from what there was in there before we had to move into Goodell," she said, adding some carrels and tables were moved to Goodell last fall to give students a place to study. Dickinson Hall, near Goodell, also has space available for studying on weekends and after 6 p.m. daily.

"As I understand it," Tunnell said, "at the beginning of the semster the administration wanted to procede carefully. They were not sure that the tower staff could handle the kind of use the building would get."

Carter triumphs over Kennedy and Brown in Maine caucuses

By JIM MORAN
Collegian Staff

BANGOR, Maine—President Jimmy Carter came one step closer to renomination at his party's convention next July by defeating Senator Edward M. Kennedy in yesterday's Maine Democratic caucuses, by a five-percent margin.

At 11:15 last night with 88 percent of the vote in, the Associated Press reported Carter was leading Kennedy with 44 percent or 826 delegates to Kennedy's 39 percent or 707 delegates, with California Governor Jerry Brown getting 15 percent or 250 delegates. 27 delegates, two percent, were uncommitted.

Based on a "proportionate" system, the number of the total 2247 delegates who will go to the state's party convention in favor of each candidate, is determined by the highest "body count" recorded for the candidate at each respective caucus. Of these 2247 state convention delegates, 22 will be chosen to represent Maine at the national convention being held in New York City next July.

On Carter's apparent win in Maine, the White House issued the following statement for the President saying, "I regret that international circumstances made it impossible for me to travel to Maine during this campaign and I look forward to the time when I am able to once again personally and directly seek the support of my fellow Democrats around the country."

Carter also congratulated Kennedy and Brown on their "strong, well-organized races."

Kennedy's national campaign manager, Stephen Smith, said the Kennedy organization was conducting a count of its own, separate of the Democratic State Committee, which indicated Kennedy's state headquarters in Augusta reported Kennedy ahead "by a 1 percent margin." Earlier reports showed Kennedy running closely with the President, in the rural areas where Carter had expected a strong showing. Also, as of 7 p.m., Carter had received 26 delegates to Kennedy's 22 in Augusta. Kennedy carried this city with 27 delegates to Carter's 17. The other urban area of Portland had yet to report its final results.

As predicted in a poll Friday in the Bangor Daily News, Gov. Brown finished a distant third, though well ahead of the 5 percent predicted by the newspaper.

In a speech at Bangor high school Saturday, Brown defined his candidacy as representing a "clear difference" from his two opponents, who he described as "two peas of a pod."

Brown spoke out against nuclear power, repeating many of the main themes consistent throughout his campaigns, and said the nation is "on a verge of realignment" in favor of renewable resources, lower health care costs, and against the draft.

When asked if he would consider throwing his support to either of his two opponents, should his third-place status continue, Brown said, "Not that I can think of at this point."

Five College students canvass Maine for Kennedy support

By JIM MORAN
Collegian Staff

BANGOR, Maine—Three busloads of Western Massachusetts students traveled to Bangor and Bitterford this past weekend to canvass those Maine communities on behalf of Senator Edward M. Kennedy in that state's Democratic presidential caucuses. Among those involved in the student effort were 11 students from the Five-College area.

Though there was a general agreement among all working this weekend that the organization, in terms of transportation and lodging accomodations, could have been better, all felt the campaigning had been a positive experience.

Lisa Ullman, a freshman at Mount Holyoke College, said the canvassing effort was made easy, "because all the homes we visited were pre-screened and were either strongly favoring Kennedy or leaning that way." She said there was little mention of issues, though oil decontrol did get a mention from one prospective caucuser.

Jill Tress, another Mount Holyoke freshman, said many of Kennedy's supporters tended to be younger persons. One interesting experience, Tress said, "was that one lady who supported Kennedy wouldn't vote for him because she was fearful for his safety."

Tress added there was much duplication of efforts, that some poeple had been contacted either by a door-to-door visit or by telephone on two or more occasions.

UMass freshman John Murphy said this weekend was "exciting." One unusual response he had came when he arrived at a home that was listed as a pro-Kennedy household. "It turns out that that was a mistake and the guy told me he didn't appreciate being interrupted because he was making love to his wife." Murphy said one dramatic moment occurred when he visited one household where the voting adults were not home, but their children were outside playing. When Murphy inquired as to where the parents were, telling them he was a Kennedy worker, one little boy said "Chappaquidick." "That's all he said 'Chappaquidick', Murphy related.

Joe Vincent, a UMass senior, said he thought the campaign experience was "valuable." He said many people were ignorant of issues, although Kennedy's health care legislation and the issue of gun control received the most voter attention.

Elizabeth Leighton, a Mount Holyoke freshperson, said although the organization was "poor, very last-minute planned," she would "do it all over again." Leighton said many people were impressed by the visits of Kennedy's daughter, Kara, and his sister, Pat Lawford, who traveled the state this past weekend.

Sam Mahler, an Amherst College freshman and bus captain for the trip, said there was a very positive response in Maine, "a more honest response." Mahler, who had worked past weekends in New Hampshire, said the Granite State's effort was evidenced by "more paranoia."

The other students, Krista Oesterling of Northampton, Jon Klein, a UMass junior, Catherine Thondal, a Mount Holyoke freshman, Simon Henshaw, a UMass sophomore, and Vanessa Thorne, also a University sophomore, all agreed that the campaign was worthwhile, that they enjoyed meeting the people of Maine and the new campaign workers.

Two factors seemed to influence this group's opinion of the trip: One that the people of Maine were more "independent" and less influenced by what they called Carter's "militarism" philosophy regarding the Afghanistan and Iranian crises, and secondly that California Governor Jerry Brown was "taking away liberal and young people's support from Kennedy." As Oesterling put it, "What a lot of people don't know is that Brown talks a lot about the dangers of nuclear power, but when he has the power to do something about it (as with the Rancho Senco plant in Sacramento), he refused to close the plant down even though it was of the same dangerous construction variety as Three Mile Island.

"Kennedy," said Oesterling, "has offered a more constructive and realistic solution in calling for a two-year moratorium of licensing and looking toward provisions for safe disposal of existing radioactive wastes."

DIGEST

Yugoslav head Tito ill again

BELGRADE, Yugoslavia (AP) — President Josip Broz Tito of Yugoslavia, who had been reported making a strong recovery from the amputation of his left leg, now has digestive and kidney troubles, his doctors said yesterday.

A medical bulletin, issued by his doctors at Ljubljana Hospital, said the 87-year-old Tito's recovery had slowed in the last few days because of a "digestive disturbance and the appearance of certain difficulties in connection with the function of his kidneys."

"Essential measures of treatment are being undertaken," the bulletin said.

It gave no further details.

The previous medical bulletin, issued Thursday, said Tito's health continued to improve and that his medical treatment and rehabilitation also continued.

Doctors amputated the aging leader's leg three weeks ago after medication and bypass surgery failed to relieve circulatory blockage.

Since the operation, Tito was reported making a rapid recovery. Only five days after the leg was removed he began to perform some of his official duties.

Hostages held for 100 days

By The Associated Press Iran prepared yesterday for the first anniversary of the Islamic revolution as some 50 Americans spent their 99th day in captivity at the U.S. Embassy in Tehran. A group of Americans on a private visit to Iran met with the Islamic militants occupying the embassy.

In northeast Gorgan province, meanwhile, violence flared in the provincial town of Gonbad-e-Kavus for a third straight day, according to a Tehran radio broadcast monitored in London. At least 15 persons have been killed and 110 others injured in clashes between members of the government's revolutionary guard and Turkoman rebels, it said. Revolutionary guards in Tehran accused Marxist-leaning guerrillas in the province of inciting the autonomy-seeking minority Turkomans.

In Tehran, President Abolhassan Bani-Sadr, sworn into office a week ago, was to preside Monday at what Tehran radio called "a grand military parade," one of a series to be held throughout the country. The festivities mark the Feb. 11, 1979 resignation of former Prime Minister Shahpour Bakhtiar, appointed to run the country by deposed Shah Mohammad Reza Pahlavi shortly before he fled Iran in mid-January.

Handicapped transport proposed

By SIOBHAN C. BREEN
Special to the Collegian

SPRINGFIELD — The Pioneer Valley Transit Authority last night held a hearing here on a proposed $4.8 million grant for transportation for the handicapped.

The PVTA has applied for $3.8 million from the federal government for the project. The remaining $1 million needed would come from state and local governments.

The plan would provide for 27 new buses with lifts, three suburban buses that would be leased to Peter Pan bus lines, eight to twelve passenger buses, 25 bus shelters and 42 new radio systems.

Ron Tober, Administrator for the PVTA, estimated the meeting lasted only about five minutes. Only one man, a longtime advocate for transportation for the handicapped, attended the hearing.

Town may charge UMass for jails

By MARK L. CURELOP
Collegian Staff

The Amherst Police Station Planning Committee discussed Friday the possibility of charging UMass and surrounding towns for use of police jail cells.

"The University is a separate government entity by state statutes empowering it's own police force," said Chief Donald Maia.

Maia compared the UMass police force to the Massachusetts Port Authority police because both are authorized by the Commonwealth.

UMass police have used the cells 257 times for protective custodies, Belchertown 15 times, and Pelham twice.

The purpose of the committee is to decide whether the town needs a new police facility or alterations should be made to the existing station, now in the basement of Town Hall. The committee, which was to make a decision on the proposal by March 1, is seeking an extension to March 14 from the Town Selectmen.

"I'd rather do a good job than a fast one," said a member of the committee.

In other business, the committee discussed the construction of new jail cells costing approximately $2,000 for an 8 x 12 foot area. The station now has three 6 x 5 foot cells.

Maia said the fixtures for the cells — plumbing, sinks, and bars — costing approximately $20,000, must be securely placed to avoid destruction by prisoners. In the past year, three sinks were ripped from cell walls, maia said.

"Does this town need a new police station? We are not prepared for an answer at this point," said Sid Meyers, who chairs the committee.

UMass gymnasts on television

The UMass men and women's gymnastic teams will be featured tonight at 7:30 on "P.M. Magazine," in a live presentation from the Holyoke Mall at Ingleside.

Assistant men's Coach Steve Nunno said Channel 3 camera crews filmed the teams for three hours last week for background shots.

Team members are "psyched," Nunno said. "It's good exposure for the team."

Nunno said the men's team, 4—2 this season, has 15 varsity members.

Nunno said the teams were not nervous about being on television. "Gymnastics is kind of like performing anyway," he said.

Virgina Evans, who coaches the 15-member women's team, 5-2 this season, said "I think it's nice to see our University getting some positive coverage."

Evans said the reporters are doing some live shows in Western Massachusetts and said they considered UMass an integral part of the area. The teams will be performing mini-trampoline routines and some tumbling at the mall, due space limitations, she said.

Draft of women court decided?

By H. JOSEF HEBERT
Associated Press

WASHINGTON (AP) — While Congress seems cool toward registering women for the draft, legal scholars say no matter what happens on Capitol Hill, the courts most likely will have the final say on whether women join men in registration lines.

And in the courts, those advocating the registration of women as well as men, including President Carter and his advisers, are expected to carry the upper hand, say many legal experts.

"Whichever way it goes (in Congress), there will be a suit filed," says Thomas Emerson, a professor of constitutional law at Yale University. "There's no way that the courts can avoid it."

The American Civil Liberties Union already has said it will challenge any attempt to register only men. "The day that the president signs (male only registration), we will be in court," vowed David Landau, a staff attorney in the ACLU's Washington office.

Phyllis Schlafly, a leading opponent of the Equal Rights Amendment and harsh critic of women's registration, said she will focus her efforts on Congress, which must approve such registration.

"There's no way Congress will register women," she insisted in an interview. But if unsuccessful on Capitol Hill, she does not rule out some court action, although the basis of such a suit on constitutional grounds is not clear.

After Carter announced Friday that he wants to register both men and women 18 and 19 years of age, White House officials said a major factor in the decision was the prospect of court challenges if women were excluded.

Special program hurting

By SEAN HARVEY
Collegian Staff

Some undergraduate courses in special education and human services are in jeopardy unless replacements can be found for four faculty members leaving at the end of this semester, Grace Craig, Division of Human Services and Applied Behavioral Sciences chairperson, said yesterday.

School of Education Dean Mario Fantini has said he is willing to support the releases of two of the positions from Governor Edward J. King's hiring freeze of all professional persons in state institutions, Craig said. Her department is in the School of Education.

The four positions can be replaced in three ways, Craig said. Either new replacements can be hired, other faculty members in the department can teach the courses or both.

"We have every hope of maintaining and increasing special education and human services at the undergraduate level but it will be at least one month before we'll be able to identify faculty who can assist in programs or secure the needed faculty replacement position," Craig said.

Human Services prepares student to work in a variety of community service agencies, such as halfway houses for people released from prisons, mental institutions, alcohol and drug rehabilitation.

There is the possibility of combining Human Services and juvenile justice into one program next fall, Craig said.

The four faculty members leaving are Donald White, Human Services, Ellis Olim, counselling, Crystal Kaiser, special education and a fourth professor in special education whose name Craig declined to reveal.

The two teaching positions Fantini is willing to release from King's hiring freeze are in special education and counselling, Craig said.

On the initial request to Fantini, it was indicated that it would be difficult to replace White, Craig said. White's position is particularly vital because he teaches many Human Services courses, she said.

"Everything depends on deliberations over the next few weeks," Craig said.

"There is no intent to shut down the Human Services program," Fantini said.

"We are reviewing all our programs to see how much money we can allocate and how many students we can serve. I would like to expand the Human Servces program."

Dancers balance ballet, jazz

By SARAH HAMMANN
Collegian Staff

The University Dancers entertained a largely student audience with a good balance of modern ballet and jazz at the Bowker Auditorium this past weekend.

As the audience settled into their seats before the performance there was a certain feeling of excitement and friendly familiarity in the air. Many students eagerly awaited performances of friends and peers.

"Esprit" launched the evening off to a promising start. As the piece opened, Kimberley Bennet, dancer and choreographer, Scott Genkinger and Kathy Szezeblowski graced the stage in light blue silhouetted figures. As the title of the piece implies, the triplet danced in a happy and carefree spirit to the music of Ralph Towner. With pleasant smiles and airy, flowing dance, the ensemble provided the audience with happy afterthoughts. Their simple yet effective spatial framework showed good staging that did not seem forced.

Further into the program, Andrew Markham choreographed and danced his own piece, "I'll Write When I Get There," to the music of David Bowie. Opening in a rocking psuedo-fetal position, Markham slowly developed will-controlled stances and arabesques. Moving across the stage with short, quick steps, the spectator sensed a feeling of paranoia. The dancer's strong sense of control helped to convey this mood.

Before intermission, a group of eight dancers unravelled a story in Carole Melanson's choreography to Chuck Mangione's "Children of Sanchez." The piece opened with a mother figure in vivid, aqua blue costume surrounded by three attentive, girlish figures in fresh white and pink camisole sundresses. As the music's mood changed abruptly and intensified with powerful brass and heavy drumbeats, four leggy women in diagonally black and white leotards, with matching black caps and leggings, charged onto the stage. They danced in sharp contrast to the saintly, lighthearted steps of the first ensemble. While the music played "I will always hear the children of Sanchez," a confrontation, between the woman protecting the innocent triplet and the vibrant foursome, concluded the piece. This blend of fast-paced and light choreography highlighted the diverse talents of the University group.

"You Can Take What You Want, But Don't Take Too Much," danced to a rendition of Billie Holiday's God Bless the Child," illuminated the second half. Donna Castleberry's number opened with a sharp focus on the pan faces of variously positioned dancers. Smooth, slow and dreamy, a subtle interlude, she danced between a lilac-leotarded blonde and a dark, virile man entranced the audience. As the music got cheeky, so did the dancers. A triplet of blondes entered the stage, leading in a jazzy hip and shoulder manner. The number closed on a sassy note with dancers staggered in sensuous poses.

In all mediums, classical, modern and jazz, the University Dancers well demonstrated their talent. Although a few numbers offered better choreography, execution and use of dance space, the troupe's performance proved a delightful night's entertainment.

Tenant turmoil

Evicted tenants arrested on trespass charge

By JACK GALLAGHER
Collegian Staff

Six people, two of whom were tenants in a seven-apartment block at 94-96 North Prospect St., were arrested Friday for trespassing on those premises, owned by Edward Kelly, assistant manager of Campus Center Building Operations.

The tenants, Laura Brezinsky and Margaret Carroll, issued an eviction notice Thursday, were arraigned in Hampshire district court Friday afternoon, along with the four others. The cases were continued without finding until Feb. 21.

Brezinsky, Carroll and Livingstone Semakula had signed an agreement with Kelly in lieu of a lease which stipulated that the tenants could not be evicted unless they failed to pay rent on the first day of each month.

Semakula said his rent was not paid Feb. 1 because he had not received a Social Security check. Carroll said her rent was not paid because her check from the Department of Public Welfare did not arrive on time.

Atty. Mark Eckstein, who represents Brezinsky, Carroll and Semakula went before Judge John F. Murphy Friday morning in attempt to have a temporary restraining order issued that would have allowed his clients to remain at the apartments for an indefinite period. Murphy did not issue that restraining order.

In September, nine tenants of the seven-apartment block formed a tenants union. Brezinsky said the tenants then withheld payment of rent because of alleged health violations in the apartments.

In October, Kelly filed a complaint in district court against the tenants for failing to pay rent. Kelly also filed a complaint against Brezinsky and Semakula for failure to sign a lease. But Brezinsky said Kelly never offered a lease for signature.

A hearing on the alleged violations against Brezinsky and Semakula was set for Oct. 3. Brezinsky said she did not receive a notice of that hearing. She and Semakula were consequently found in default.

The complaint against the tenants for failing to pay rent was eventually settled out of court, Brezinsky said, when she and Semakula agreed to accept $100 in retribution for food that spoiled because of a faulty refrigerator.

The others arrested Friday were: Vincent O'Conner, Sharon Brezinsky, Edward McGlinn and David Detmold.

He has no home and 'no money'

By JACK GALLAGHER
Collegian Staff

He stood on the side walk Friday afternoon, after the others had been taken away, and he wondered aloud what he was going to do.

A UMass graduate student in Chemical Engineering, Livingstone Semakula, was "fed up, tired.. exhausted" as he stood on the sidewalk on North Prospect Street, watching people carry some of his furniture out of the apartment he used to rent.

Semakula, a native of East Africa who has been in this country nine years, had watched as six of his friends stood in front of the door to what was once an apartment he had rented.

And he had watched as Donald Maia, chief of the Amherst Police Department, a host of UMass and special assignment police officers, as well as Robert Schowobe, deputy sherriff of Hampshire County, advised the six that they would be arrested for trespassing if they did not leave the premises.

Originally, there had been about a dozen people in front of the door. But when Maia and the other officers had approached the door and said those who did not leave would be arrested, about half of the group dispersed. Semakula said he had not been among those at the door because he is not a citizen of the United States and the status of his visa could have been changed if he had decided to stand in front of that door.

The people in front of the door—one of whom was holding a sign that read:"Housing for people, not profit," were asked individually if they would disperse. Each had nodded his head after listening to Maia, which meant each knew they would be arrested.

Then the six people in front of the door had been taken away, to be put in a police car and driven to Hampshire District Court, one at a time. Laura Brezinsky was the first to go, her feet dragging behind her as two policemen brought her to a police car.

Six police cars had been parked on North Prospect Street since about 10 Friday morning. Another vehicle from the Sherriff's office had been there since 8 that morning, as had a 30-foot moving van.

Frankfurt symphony at FAC

By NORMA J. COATES
Collegian Staff

The Frankfurt Radio Symphony, with guest pianist Ruth Laredo, gave the final performance of their 11-engagement debut tour of the United States at the Fine Arts Center Thursday night.

A varied selection of works from the Modern, Classical and Romantic eras of composition showcased the talent and versatility of the Symphony, which is recognized as one of Europe's leading orchestras.

This reputation was confirmed throughout the show, opening with the 20th-century piece, Three Dances of the Tritons, from the ballet Undine, by Hans Henze. This demanding piece was replete with the turbulence and dissonance which characterizes Modern composition. The Symphony performed this work masterfully, in colorful and coherent manner, emphasizing brass and percussion but not overpowering the other sections of the orchestra. The second piece, Beethoven's Concerto for Piano and Orchestra No. 2 in B-flat, featured soloist Ruth Laredo on piano.

One of the world's foremost concert pianists, she demonstrated a whimsical, but highly accurate and polished style of playing which peaked the listeners' interest and attention. The Symphony provided Ms. Laredo's performance with an unobtrusive but vital background. The third piece, Dvorak's Symphony No. 8 in G major demonstrated once again the Symphony's ability to play many styles of music with excellence. The emotion and folk roots of the Czech nationalist composer was well expressed, performed by the orchestra with an intensity discernible even in the softest string passages.

The enthusiastic audience was rewarded with an encore, an overture from an opera by Verdi, like Dvorak a composer of the 19th century. This, too, was delivered with the energy and ability which characterized the entire performance.

French play at AC turns up sour

By DAVID AMBOS
Special to the Collegian

The Exchange, which was presented at Amherst College this past weekend, is a play translated from the French. After viewing it, one might wish the original had been written in Urdu or Linear-A or some language that would have precluded translation. Or that Whit Whales, the clearly multi-talented translator-director-designer of the production, had realized that Paul Claudel's play is boring enough in one language. Rendered in English, it simply becomes insipid in a second idiom. It's comparable to a French company dubbing old episodes of "My Mother the Car" for syndication overseas. In either case, the end result is offensive to two cultures.

At various points during the play, abortive attempts are made to introduce characterization, symbolism, intensity, structure, depth, style and humor, but all efforts fizzle like a child's sparklers.

To be fair, one can conceivably imagine how such a play might have originally attracted a translator. For one, it is obscure and one might argue deservedly so. Also, on paper, and en Francais, Claudel's "drama" is less a nightmare and more a gentle soporific, kind of like literary Sominex. On stage, however, it was stupefying.

Of the small cast of four, only Lisa Friedlander as Lechy Elbernon made her role interesting. For the rest, the most that can be said for them is that they occassionally rose to the level of their material.

As a translator, Mr. Whales obviously has talent. His choice of a play was a mistake in judgement.

For example, someone whose only responsibility is scene design would probably have realized that it is inevitably a mistake to design a set that is more interesting to look at than the play it adorns.

Editorial/Opinion

Fear and loathing on the Western Front

ERIC JANSZEN

In the nationally honored tradition of Orwellian doublethink, I am presenting, in separate columns, two contradicting views of the future, the draft, and going to war. I don't agree more with one view than the other, that wouldn't be doublethink. I hold both mutually exclusive beliefs simltaneously and with equal conviction. Why? Because I'm a rational being, and so are you.

When we talk about the future, we're thinking about the past. From unmistakable indications of serious change our imaginations now transform what we understand of history into feelings of uncertainty, challenge, hope, confusion, and, on a bad day, annoying fear. We argue the issues—draft, war, evasion, duty, killing and being killed—with friends in a bar in Amherst, an apartment in Sunderland, a dorm room on Orchard Hill, and the air is excitement, involvement, loathing and relief; soon the wait (for what?) will be over.

This is today. History, information to avoid old mistakes, is for other, older circumstances. It is not the same then as it is now. Whatever lessons the past offers, they rest untouchable, inert, and forever unfamiliar.

For all we know of the past, of how one thing has led to another, there may be no more certain prediction than that made intuitively. The details of history, the wheres and hows and whys of historic events like war and killing, scatter through our veins, lost in a complex of dissimilarities; useless information.

But the impression of history is real, is what we expect. Many expect war, and that excites them. They feel pulled away by it, drawn in; push and push back. They see no folly in their vision, that isn't what they're looking for. Serious excitement, war. Call it what you like, but this treachery has inertia even before it has mass.

"Maybe it was all over for us in Indochina when Alden Pyle's body washed up under the bridge at Dakao, his lungs full of mud; maybe it caved in with Dien Mien Phu. But the first happened in a novel, and while the second happened on the ground it happened to the French, and Washington gave it no more substance than if Graham Greene had made it up too. Straight history, auto-revised history, history without handles, for all the books and articles and white papers, all the talk and miles of film, something wasn't answered, it wasn't even asked. We were backgrounded, deep, but when the background started sliding forward not a single life was saved by the information. The thing had transmitted too much energy, it heated up too hot, hiding low under the fact-figure crossfire there was a secret history, and not a lot of people felt like running in there to bring it out."

Michael Herr
Dispatches

The world as a Felini movie.

The question becomes this: Out of the legacy of misunderstanding and caprice which is the order, if that is the word, of human history, how will there be options? But it is a stupid question, stupider than any; because when it all comes to a threat of war, there are only two options: live or die, for any reason. And after our lives have been spent making which car to buy and which TV program to watch and which University to attend decisions against a background of affluence and the awkward security of being a part of the world's almighty nation, how are we now each to ask, "What have I had that I am going to die for?"

To us the past is a dead man. We look balefully upon him, even study him, but do not accept that he ever lived. Everything he was before his death—his thought and experience, his eyes and limbs and heart—he remains; but ended. All remains but life itself. We see him, like the past, having nothing to give but his corpse, as a model for our own, the past we will make.

This is an age where old errors will not have old consequences. A threat of world war is a likelihood of world destruction. But many, like Professor Holesovsky (Collegian 2/5/80), present the "simple logic" that fear, now as before, is our greatest threat, that we must be willing; not fearing—for our own protection. They have forgotten that now, as never before, fear alone is keeping the world from ripping itself apart.

Willingness is war; war is destruction. More simple logic.

We have more to fear than fear itself; we have nothing to fear but nothing itself. Some will speak of history's self imitation saying there's nothing new under the sun and if they "have to" they'll fight. They're not thinking. They're out of their fucking minds.

Eric Janszen is a Collegian columnist

"Dean Bill Field candidly admitted to being secretive about what exactly his office actually does..."

ANN BOLGER

It seems everytime I pick up the Daily Collegian recently, Dean Field's face is smiling out at me. Why? Because he has been visibly attempting to confront officers of the Student Government Association (SGA) and force them into responding to a draft entitled, Student Activities on the Amherst Campus.

As the Attorney General of the Student Government Association, I believe I can provide a valid perspective on this unsigned draft.

Field states that this report was compiled as an orientation packet for Chancellor Henry Koffler and Vice-Chancellor Dennis Madson, to provide them with an historical perspective of student government on this campus. It perplexes me as to why this strongly biased document was really prepared. I question this preparation because the draft was distributed to various University administrators and hand-delivered to the editor-in-chief of a public newspaper, before it was ever brought to the students. Apparently Field has taken to educating anyone who comes within convenient earshot as to an administrative opinion on the past history of questionable acts performed by some SGA characters (most of which allegedly occured in or before 1978 and all of which ended in 1979).

The document fails to mention any of the positive aspects of SGA involvement on this campus. There is no mention of the 20 student-run businesses and co-ops; little or no mention of the Transit Service or WMUA; no mention of the over 400 RSO student clubs and groups and no mention of student participation in/on campus task forces and committees set up to research campus issued like vandalism, poor lighting, voter registration, academic policy, etc.

In light of this blatant disregard for recognition of student involvement, I question if this draft is a fair or even an objective historical perspective of student activities!

Dean Field was recently quoted in the Daily Collegian (2/6/80) in the following context: "Field criticized what he sees as an undesirable love of power in the student government's "insane" reaction to his charges. "[student leader]" wants to be elevated to sainthood," he said.

And yet, in a letter he sent to student senators at last week's Senate meeting (1/30/80) he wrote: "As the new semester begins, I ask each of you to look closely at the importance of cooperation in attaining our mutual goals, and to recognize the inherent destructiveness of a relationship based on fear and suspicion."

The most recent copy of Conduit (February 1980), an administrative publication of the Student Affairs Staff Development Committee, includes a front page story entitled, "What's Going on in the Dean of Students' Office?". The first sentence of that article reads, "Dean BILL FIELD candidly admitted to being secretive, about what exactly his office actually does," (sic), and - in a following paragraph, one reads; "We're willing to poke around in almost everything,' said Field."

As the Attorney General of the SGA, I am in a position to investigate and clean up any delinquent situations arising from within the massive student government structure. In looking back over my past five years at UMass, I can't remember a time when the SGA didn't publicize the existence of corruption or of a corrupt situation and bring these weak points out to the purview of students. People still talk about a former Speaker and alleged financial misconduct through long distant phone calls, an event which is alledged to have occured in Spring 1978. The Attorney General was involved in the investigation and brought things out into full public disclosure.

We, as student leaders, have never been and will never be, 'secretive' about exactly what we do. Our services are the products of student work and effort. As students we try to provide for ourselves and this community an unparalelled enterprise and array of student supported and coordinated organizations and businesses.

I could justify the existence of this administrative draft if it had been prepared and disseminated in a supportive manner, to assist students in pinpointing problem areas in our structure. In this manner, students, faculty and administration could have worked collectively to strengthen the student government structure and eliminate any weak spots in our bureaucracy. But, in my opinion, since I first became aware of this draft, I've seen it used by the administration solely in an attempt to discredit the hard-working and positive efforts of students currently involved in the SGA.

Over the past year, many students within the SGA have put in long hours and much quality work into many areas that involve accountability. Among these areas are: the development of an effective and concise student personnel policy, design of a sexual harrassment grievance procedure, revision of our Constitution, massive research into responsive computerized accounting systems to monitor financial accounts of the student senate, SGA, and RSO, and the resurrection and revitalization of the student judiciary system.

I believe Dean Field may have justifiable, serious personality conflicts, with certain members of the SGA. But his personal differences cannot, in my mind, justify what appears to be a blatant and subersive (although poorly planned) attack on the present SGA structure and its membership of over 18,000 students through the publication and circulation of a report such as this draft.

Corporate-college unity ill-intentioned

DAN HUSE

In a recent interview with the Collegian, the Dean of the Engineering School argued that the current partnerhship between Big Business and public higher education does not represent a trend towards turning public colleges and universities into trade schools. By focussing only on the Engineering School's plan to raise funds from private sources, he overlooked the broader, long-term trends which are affecting public higher education in Massachusetts and across the country. Briefly, these trends are: tuition hikes, budget cuts, elimination of liberal arts programs, and tailoring education to meet the demands of employers, i.e. vocationalization.

A good example of a plan to reorganize public higher education to meet the demands of employers is the Dover Project. In December, The Springfield Union ran a four-part series on a project involving Digital Equipment Corporation and the Massachusetts State College System. The aim of the Dover Project is to turn the state colleges into a training ground for the high technology industries of Massachusetts. Business Administration programs would also be beefed up in order to provide both services and employees to Massachusetts businesses. The one business which would lose out, however, would be the "business" of providing a quality college education to working and middle class youth.

Recent plans for reorganizing the public system have directed their heaviest fire toward the state colleges, whose administrators now have their backs to the wall and are ready to accept anything which preserves their "turf." Even under the Dover Project some state colleges may be eliminated entirely. It is argued that, since more and more potential students do not apply because they cannot afford the rising public tuitions, there is a decreasing demand for public higher education. Predictions of future declines in enrollments will be fulfilled with the help of a new round of tuition hikes being proposed by the King Administration.

Although the state colleges are hardest hit, UMass is not immune to these trends. The deplorable condition of the buildings on campus is one symptom of the state's lack of commitment to maintainning a quality public university. While the School of Engineering gets private contributions, there is a shortage of Economics courses and 600 Spanish students have been threatened with the elimination of their sections. The "solutions" being proposed are further cutbacks and tuition hikes. Meanwhile, the Reorganization Commission is holding all public institutions accountable to the private employers of Massachusetts. Unless we act now our younger brothers and sisters may not have the opportunity to attend a school worthy of the name "University", and we ourselves may not be able to complete the education we were planning on.

Now there is nothing wrong with private corporations supporting public education; in fact, all social services should be funded through progressive taxation which places the burden on big business, and not on the working and middle classes who cannot afford it. The problem with the current plans for "cooperation" is that private corporations support only those programs which serve their narrow interests. In other words, they support publicly subsidized job training while calling for overall cutbacks in public higher education. These cutbacks are aimed especially at liberal arts programs, which are an important part of a well-rounded college education, but which do not contribute directly to the employers' profits.

Tune rewritten: Up Against the Wall

To the Editor

I would like to dedicate this next number to the chancellor of this fine University:

We don't need no education.
We don't need no books to read
No research papers for our courses
It's just a u-ni-ver-sity.
Yes, just a u-ni-ver-sity.

We don't need to use the 'brary.
Leave it for those older lads.
No need to have a place to study
Hell, we're only undergrads
Yes, that's right, only undergrads.

Lesbian Union support grows

To the Editor

As members of the Lesbian Union, we feel a need to respond to your recent article of 2/5/80. Especially as it is the beginning of a new semester, it is particularly important for lesbians to know who we are and what we are doing. While your article highlighted the problems our organization has been experiencing, we still offer a number of valuable services and resources to lesbians in the UMass community. These range from a drop-in center to counseling services.

We are a collective organization, and as such we always stress the importance of making our decisions together. It is unfortunate that the view that readers may have gotten from the article was extremely individual in nature. What this means is that the views of one of our members does not necessarily reflect the opinions of the organization as a whole.

As an organization stil in its "formative" stages, it is really rather amazing that we still survive at all, given the unsupportive atmosphere within which we have to struggle. Because of the nature of our organization, we cannot exist without input into the collective. We want to further our growth; this, however, is impossible without the continued support of all lesbians at the University.

For now, what we ask is that all interested women please show their support by dropping by the office during our office hours (daily between 10-12, and various other times).

Thank you,
The Lesbian Union

Moran's article: Funny journalism

To the Editor

I thought Jim Moran's article, "Carter policies political pathology," (Feb. 7th) was one of the funniest pieces of journalism I've ever read, although I'm afraid it was intended to be serious. In it, he takes us on his own little trip to a political "Fantasy Island" where President Carter collaborates with Ayatollah Khomeini to win votes in Iowa. Then we learn that Carter was part of the corporate structure which, according to Moran, killed both John and Bobby Kennedy and this year is going after Ted.

Moran also wants detente continued, even though the Soviets are in Afghanistan. He accuses Carter of overracting to the Soviets and suggests that we ignore their attack. Well, Jim, we ignored Nazi aggression in 1939 to the point where we nearly lost WW II. Should we hide under the isolationist rock now and watch the Soviet Empire grow, unchecked?

Again we hear the cries "Vietnam!" in relation to Afghanistan. In case Mr. Moran didn't already know it, in Vietnam, we became involved in a civil war between ideologies. Afghanistan is not a battle of ideologies, it is blatant Soviet aggression.

Finally, Moran criticized Carter's grain embargo, stating that Americans will have to sacrifice. I'm afraid that our generation doesn't know the meaning of the word "sacrifice." The days of getting everything handed to us on a silver platter are over. It's about time our generation began making some sacrifices. Our parents did from 1941-45. I hate to imagine what this country would be like if men like Thomas Jefferson and John Hancock had decided not to sacrifice for what they believed in.

Military readiness military deterrent

To the Editor,

In response to Steven Pineo's letter of Feb. 5, I would like to present him with a few reasons why we should oppose registration for the draft. The most obvious reason is the registration is unnecessary. On July 10, 1979 the Director of Selective Services testified before a Senate Committee that peace time registration would only add three days to the process when, and if, the draft is reinstated.

What registration would accomplish is the psychological preparation of the American people for war, and the further complication of an already large bureacracy [and it is we, the taxpayers who foot the bills]. The Joint Chiefs of Staff have also testified before a Senate Committee saying that the present Volunteer Army is alive and well; the educational level of enlistees is up along with higher average test scores. The major problem faced by the Armed Forces today is that of maintaining a career force, and the draft will only worsen that problem and cause an even higher rate of attrition.

I, furthermore, fail to see the simplicity of Prof. Holesovsky's "simple logic". How can the draft ensure my personal safety if all the indications point towards war? Recent events show that the Carter Administration has already regressed into a Cold War stance, and the strengthening of our "defense capabilities" can only be viewed by the U.S.S.R. as an offensive move in preparation of war. An escalated arms race and the breakdown of relations between the United States and the Soviets means the elimination of the possibility of peaceful coexistence.

Of course I'm concerned about my personal safety, but I'm equally concerned about the well-being of all other human beings including the Afghans, Iranians, Pakistanis and the Soviets. His concern extends especially to the future children. It is up to us today to make sure the world is still in existence for our children of tomorrow, and that it is a peaceful, healthy place for them to grow in. To do this through war is an impossibility and a contradiction in terms. Without meaning to sound melodramatic, the next war may well be the last, because for the first time in the history of war, we have the capability of completely destroying the world.

The Soviets must be criticized for invading Afghanistan. It is terrible and wrong. But for Americans to claim that we have the right and DUTY to send troops into Iran and Pakistan to protect the "interest" of Mobil and Exxon is equally wrong. Yes, we need oil, but just because we are a "superpower" does not give us [or the Soviets] an unconditional right to it.

In peace,
Judy Weiss

Dorm partiers regret uninvited guests

To the Editor

I am writing to complain about treatment my dorm has received at two separate functions in the Campus Center. Recently, we held a holiday party in the Hatch. We were assured of a cash bar and use of the room until 1:00 a.m. At 12:10, the bar closed, and at 12:35, the "bouncers" that we were forced to hire from Food Services began to kick us out. This led to much antagonism and an untimely ending to our party. Moreover, these "security" people tried everything short of direct threats to prevent us from cleaning the Hatch—a commitment which we had made prior to the party in order to obtain a waiver of the $75.00 room fee!

We were treated similarly at our semi-formal on the 10th Floor of the Campus Center. Upon going to RSO with these complaints, we were told that other groups had received the same abuses. I urge all student groups and their representatives who have been ill-treated and ripped-off to lodge formal complaints with the Campus Center and RSO. These illegalities can no longer be silently suffered by students.

Draft registration a solution to peace

To the Editor

I don't think the draft is a good thing, but I do think it might be necessary.

I heard a college student on a news show say that he opposed reinstatemnt of the draft in a peacetime situation. A lot of people seem to feel the same way. I hate to be the one to break the bad news, but this is not a peacetime situation. In peacetime situations embassies don't get taken over by force and countries like Afghanistan don't have to fight for their independence. If we wait until we're directly involved in a war before we start the draft we're going to be in a lot of trouble.

I'm not one who believes we should initiate wars, but I support defensive wars as long as the cause is a good one. The Vietnam War [which our leaders called a defensive war] was a crime against humanity because we were fighting against an independence movement. The current situation is entirely different.

The Soviet Union took over Afghanistan because they need a seaport in the south. They are now one giant step closer. To realize their goal they will have to take over Pakistan, an ally of ours. IF THE U.S. WANTS TO BE A LEADER OF THE FREE WORLD, WE MUST BE WILLING TO ACCEPT THE RESPONSIBILITIES THAT GO WITH THE JOB. That includes defending our allies if they become the target of a military invasion.

Another route to the sea that the Soviet Union could take is through Iran. They would be killing two birds with one stone, because they would then control a large part of the world's oil supply. Many Americans, college students in particular, believe that a war to protect the Persian Gulf would only benefit large corporations. This is a naive, uniformed point of view. If the Persian Gulf was brought into the Soviet sphere, the supply of oil to the Western World would be so drastically reduced that our economies would be crippled. Alternative sources of energy should be developed [starting right now] but that would take time and energy, most of which is currently derived from oil.

The draft protestors say that we should solve our problems using non-violent means. That's all well and good if the rest of the world is willing to go along with it. When another country attacks us, or our allies, I don't think they'll want to listen to talk. The only thing that will convince the Soviet Union to stay out of Pakistan or Iran is a belief that we are willing to resist their efforts with military force.

I disagree with the anti-draft people, but I am glad to see that they are taking a stand. On this issue, and many others, there are few middlemen. It seems that the apathy of the '70's is fading away. Mankind is in a position to either destroy itself or launch itself to new heights of greatness.

Will politics doom Olympics?

By WILL GRIMSLEY
Associated Press

LAKE PLACID, N. Y. (AP) — Is the Modern Olympic movement doomed? Will the XIII Winter Games, opening Wednesday in this little Adirondack village be the last for years, perhaps generations?

Such a somber spectre was raised Saturday night when the meeting of the International Olympic Committee meeting was formally opened with a sharp division between the IOC president, Lord Killanin, and U.S. Secretary of State Cyrus Vance, representing the president of the United States, on the basic concept of the quadrennial international sports spectacle.

"If the basic principles of the Olympics are ignored," Vance said in his welcoming address, urging a shift of the 1980 Summer Olympics from Moscow, "the future of the Games themselves will be placed in jeopardy."

"Solutions to the political problems of the world," countered Killanin, "are not the responsibility of sporting bodies such as the International Olympic Committee but of the appropriate governmental organizations."

In effect, Vance, speaking for the U. S. government, contends it is impossible to play friendly games with a nation that is beating up on a neighbor — in this case, the USSR's intervention in Afghanistan.

The American position was greeted politely but coolly by the audience, which was largely Olympic oriented, and even U. S. delegates to the IOC felt Vance was impolite to bring politics into his welcoming speech.

At 12:45 p.m., seven police officers stood across the street from the apartments, while some of the tenants and their friends stood in the driveway at 94-96 North Prospect St. which is off of Main Street. Awhile later, the officers went and sat in police cars. The others remained in the drive way.

Meanwhile, Jon Hanke, who chairs the Amherst Landlord-Tenant Relations Committee, was taking to Brezinsky in her rented apartment in an attempt to mediate an agreement between her and Edward Kelly, who owns the building.

Then Hanke went and talked to Kelly, who was sitting in his house which stands adjacent to the apartment Brezinsky rented.

Then, awhile later, Maia knocked on Kelly's door, the latter came out and the two—along with other officers—walked to the door where Brezinsky and the others were standing.

Then, after the six had been arrested, Semakula stood on the sidewalk, saying he had a tent he could sleep in, if necessary.

Semakula said he had no money.

Moslems capture two towns

KARACHI, Pakistan (AP) — Moslem rebels recaptured two towns in Badakhshan province in northeast Afghanistan ye sterday and laid siege to the capital city of Faizabad in bitter fighting with Soviet troops, a Pakistani newspaper reported.

The daily newspaper Jang said the rebels seized the towns of Tashkan Arbo and Bagh in the Kashma district of Badakhshan, and that fighting continued in nearby Zebak. It said they seized arms, ammunition and food from the fleeing Soviet troops.

In Moscow, the Communist Party newspaper Pravda charged that the United States — with the backing of Pakistan and China — is striving to step up offensive operations by the Afghan guerrillas.

The Soviet news media made no direct mention of Western reports that in coming weeks Moscow may withdraw some of the estimated 90,000 Russian troops now in Afghanistan.

U.S. officials have said they expect the Soviets will make only a "cosmetic" withdrawal in an attempt to defuse Western opposition to the intervention.

A Pravda commentary repeated the Kremlin's previously stated position that if outside "interference" in Afghanistan ceases, "the limited Soviet military contingent ... will return home."

Dundon shines but swimmers nipped by UVM

By SCOTT SOLOMON
Collegian Staff

The UMass men's swim team dropped its third consecutive meet of the new year last Saturday, as it was beaten by the Vermont mermen, 57-56, lowering its season mark to 1-5.

The Minutemen were behind from the opening gun, as Vermont recorded a victory in the 400-yard medley relay with a 3:53.2 finish to jump out to a 7-0 lead.

Mike Boucher brought UMass back to within 11-5, completing the 1000-yard freestyle event in 10:52.6. It was Boucher's first win in that race in four attempts.

Massachusetts tied the meet at 17 with Tom Dundon's victory in the 50-yard freestyle, as he whipped through the two lap competition in 22.6 seconds. Teammate Steve Samuel was right behind, at 23.5.

But that was as close as UMass would come to victory all afternoon. Vermont stretched its lead, grabbing first place in the next three meets, including the one-meter diving competition. UVM's Dave Clark topped both Dan Anthony and Mark Vernaglia, with a total of 248.75 points.

Tom Dundon narrowed the Vermont lead from nine (35-26), to eight (39-31), with a win in the 100-yard freestyle (49.2 seconds), his second victory of the day. Dundon would later make himself 3-0 in the meet, as he was part of the record setting 400-yard freestyle relay team, which completed its course in 3:21.3. Steve Samuel, John Sleeman, and Jib Bowers also shared the spotlight in the relay record.

The mermen next take to the water Wednesday when they travel to Durham, N.H. to take on the University of New Hampshire. With just four meets remaining, UMass would have to win all to make .500 for the season.

Spikers sparkle

The men's volleyball team began its home season Saturday with a pair of wins over Harvard and Northeastern at NOPE gym.

Playing Harvard first, UMass shrugged off the Crimson's blocking prowess to win in straight games, 15-9, 15-9, 15-12. The match was dominated with action at the net, as Harvard and UMass exchanged sets and spikes throughout the match. Pat Ryan, Orlando Larracuente, and Ed Midura used some off-speed hitting to throw off the Crimson and score. While good at blocking, Harvard was poor at passing the ball from the backcourt to the net; the defending New England Collegiate Volleyball League champions could not capitalize on their well-timed defense and several net penalties against UMass because of sub-par passing.

The Huskies of Northeastern University played UMass with more hitting and defense than Harvard. Last year's NECVL runner-up fell to UMass 11-15, 11-15, 15-10, 11-15. Quique Caballero, Pat Ryan, Orlando Larracuente and Jim Grosslein forced the Huskies away from the outside and into the frontcourt, which left the corners virtually free. Some well-placed dinks and spikes to these unmanned areas kept the UMass offense going. Northeastern played a stubborn, drawn-out match, spiking hard and getting the ball out of the backcourt. However, the UMass defense bottled up the Huskies' hitting game enough to win the match.

This sweep follows Thursday night's victory over New England power Yale University, 15-11, 15-6, 10-15, 15-11. In all three matches, UMass utilized a type of set which prevents those opposing at the net from blocking this low, quickly dispatched set.

"This set, as well as our "2" set (which frees the middle blocker to defend the net in case the potential spike is returned), have been working very well," said Coach Al Morel.

Now 3-0 overall, UMass will travel to West Point for a Monday evening game against the Cadets.

Donahue is outstanding; helps UM over Middies

By BOB MITCHELL
Collegian Staff

Bob Donahue earned a 49.95, the highest Minuteman all-around score of the season, to lead the UMass men's gymnastics team to a 242.45-226.55 victory over Navy, Saturday afternoon at the Boyden auxilary gym.

(The squad will be featured in a segment of tomorrow's PM Magazine television program, which airs at 7:30 p.m. on Channel 3.)

The MInutemen, although winning four of the first five events, were leading the meet by a slim five point margin going into the final event. The young Navy squad had battled UMass in every event and stayed close. The Minutemen had won no event by more than three-and-one-half points. But the Midshipmen could not compare to the outstanding UMass high bar effort and the Minutemen pulled away with a 44.25-33.80 event win.

Frank Cohen and Hugh O'Neall each earned 9.30 on the bar, while Donahue tallied a 9.25. Bob Lamb and Wayne Wright also performed well for the Minutemen, scoring 8.40 and 8.00 respectively.

Dave Buegler led the UMass squad to its first event victory, with a fine 9.10 on the floor. Mate John MacCurdy, participating in his first meet of the season, looked sharp with an 8.25. But the real story in the event was that Bob Lamb sustained a minor back injury while performing his set, and left the mat. He quickly returned to action though, to aid the Minutemen to victory.

UMass Coach Ray Johnson said that Lamb returning made the difference in the meet. For had he not returned to action, the team would have had to count all five scores in each event, rather than five out of six.

Bob Ross scored an 8.35 and Tim Barry earned a 7.65, as UMass defeated Navy 36.25-32.95 on the pommel horse to gain its second event. The Midshipmen came back to earn their only victory of the meet in the next event, as they posted a 39.90-38.20 win on the still rings.

The Minutemen, however, got back on the winning track with a three-point win in the vaulting competition. Lamb scored an outstanding 9.50 in the event while Beugler and MacCurdy added a 9.10 each. Donahue came up with a 9.10 performance on the parallel bars to give UMass a slim 36.20-36.05 victory.

The win brought the Minutemen record up to 4-2, and keyed the squad up for Wednesday night's meet. UMass will host the nationally ranked Southern Connecticut State College squad at 7:00 p.m. in the Cage. The meet is a double-dual, and will feature both the men's and women's squads from both schools.

Hoopwomen dispatch NU for sixth straight

UMass' Val DePaolo dribbles past Holly Stevenson of Northeastern Saturday. The Minutewomen play West Virginia at 3 p.m. today at the Cage. (Staff photo by Ben Marsden)

By MIKE ESTRADA
Collegian Staff

From the Massachusetts point of view, Saturday's 78-74 win against Northeastern University had everything you didn't want to see in a game and then some.

The Minutewomen blew a 16-point lead in the first half and were faced with an aggressive NU team that is probably the best 7-8 organization in New England.

An incredible 60 personal fouls were called in the game before 500 at the Cage. UMass center Julie Ready fouled out with 7:15 left. Sue Peters, Tricia Corcoran and Ginger Legare all finished with four. Northeastern took the brunt of the barrage, however. Four starters including Beth Peterson, Marvita Davis, Hildegarde Regan and Vicki Sparks (21 points) fouled out within the last seven minutes.

The second half became largely a parade to the foul line. Though cold from the field, the Minutewomen and Peters were red hot from the line, shooting 78 percent. Peters sunk 15 of 16 attempts to pace her 25 point effort, the game high.

Otherwise, it was not the best game Massachusetts had played this season. They were troubled by the rebounding of Peterson and Sparks in the first half, and drives inside in the second half, when fronting the ball carrier could have meant a fifth foul and ejection.

"I didn't think the game was going to be that physical," Peters said. I got into foul trouble early and luckily I didn't foul out. But I wasn't playing the defense I should have been."

The Huskies went on top at 1:35 of the first half when Peterson drove the lane for a lay-up. The NU lead stretched to three when Vicki Sparks tossed in a six-footer to end the first half.

Julie Ready (9 points) hit a shot and added a free throw to tie the game early in the second half. Valerie De Paolo netted a 20-footer behind a pair of Peters free throws to put UMass up 47-43 at 16:51.

But Northeastern refused to die, erasing UMass leads of five and eight points. Even after Davis and Regan fouled out, Sparks, seven for nine from the line, hit both ends of a one-and-one to put NU up 74-73 at 3:25. Northeastern immediately blew chances to extend its lead with two one-and-one situations, but the Minutewomen capitalized on their attempts. At 1:39, Peters broke up from her low position to steal the ball. She was fouled on her lay-up but matter-of-factly tossed in two to put UMass (now 12-6) up to stay at 75-74.

Matmen down Springfield

By DONNA SULLIVAN
Collegian Staff

"Everybody wrestled well," said an elated Coach Dave Amato with a heavy emphasis on "every", "even the guys who got beat wrestled well." For the first time since Amato himself was a varsity wrestler in 1972, the Matmen defeated the Chiefs of Springfield College Friday night 21-13.

Umass won six of ten bouts in front of a rowdy standing room only crowd in Springfield's Moses Hall.

"It was sweet," Amato said, "I think it was only the second time we ever beat them."

The hometown fans will get their last chance to watch John Allen and the matmen in action at home when they host Central Connecticut in Boyden gym at 7:30 tonight. It is the last time the matmen will see action at home.

Greg Johnson started the UMass scoring off in Springfield with an 11-7 victory in the 134 pound class. Johnson started out strong bringing Springfield's Joe Arrante down three times in three minutes. Arrante gained momentum bringing the match to 7-7 with 35 seconds left to wrestle.

Two escapes and a takedown brought Johnson to victory over Arrante.

Mike Carroll outclassed Springfield's Guy Ventura, working him hard and staying ahead throughout the bout. Carroll brought Ventura down a total of four times and threatened with a pin one minute and ten seconds into the second period.

In a night that saw a majority of very close bouts, 177 pound Bob Clark chalked up the only superior decision, defeating Peter Smith 16-6. Clark brought the matmen to within one point in the overall score with two matchjes remaining.

190 pound Bill McQuade brought Herb Alamed down early in the first period but Alamed hung tough and posed quite an obstacle to McQuade's winning. McQuade put UMass in the lead with a close, 9-5 win.

Once again Heavyweight John Allen proved himself unbeatable with a pin just two minutes and twelve seconds into the bout. No sooner had the second period begun when the mighty Allen ended the meet, topping off an exciting performance.

Results: UMass 21 SC 13; 118 Lewis SC dec Schiarizzi UM 20-14; 126 Hawes SC dec O'Boyle UM 14-3; 134 Johnson UM dec Arrante 11-7; 142 Webb SC dec MacDonald UM 5-3; 150 Devov UM dec Hitchon 12-6; 158 Carroll UM dec Ventura SC 10-5; 167 Scanlon SC dec McEntee UM 9-6, 177 Clark UM dec Smith 16-6; 190 McQuade UM dec Alamed Sc 9-5; HWT Allen UM pinned Carroll 2:12.

Cagers drop another

By JONATHAN HAMILTON
Collegian Staff

Rory Sparrow, Tom Sienkiewitz, and John Pinone combined for 44 points to lead a balanced Villanova scoring attack over a scrappy UMass squad, 79-64 Saturday. All the 2800 fans who showed up to the Cage were treated to one of the Minutemen's finest efforts of the season as they continued to play aggressively, thwarting the Wildcats' attempts to put the game away.

Several times in the second half, UMass closed within 4 but was unable to convert the next time down the floor. UMass' Bill Morrison had a chance to close the lead (44-40) to 3 at 14:46 with a three-point play but missed the free-throw attempt. Villanova then upped the lead to ten (50-40) with consecutive baskets by Aaron Howard, Stewart Granger and two free-throws by Pinone.

Still, UMass refused to die as Ty Nedd's inside move past two Wildcats for a hoop, a Morrison jumper, Nedd again with a lay-up, (called a charge after the basket), and a Curtis Phauls basket at 10:26 cut it to 4 once more, 52-48. But this time, the Minutemen committed some costly fouls giving Villanova the opportunity to put the game out of reach at the foul line. They did just that making five of six extending their lead to 57-48. UMass would only be able to get within 7 (57-50) with a Jay Stewart basket at 8:01. After the Villanova shot well and made their free throws outdistancing UMass in the last eight minutes 22-14.

In all the Cats shot 53 percent frim the field and 88 percent from the foul line. That proved to be a big factor in the game as the Cats made 23 out of 26 free-throw attempts. The Minutemen were sent to the line only 5 times, canning just 4 of them. They shot 45 percent from the field.

At the outset of the game, it seemed that Sparrow would dominate throughout with his red-hot shooting as he did in the first half, hitting 7 for 7, netting 14 points. He scored just nine seconds into the game and again at 19:24 with Villanova's first two baskets. But UMass came right back with hoops by Phauls and Nedd. UMass led only once 10-9 at 14:28 on Pedro de la Cruz's basket. It was short lived, however, as baskets by Sinkiewicz and Pinone sandwiched between a three point play by Alex Bradley made the score 16-10. At 10:33 Bradley was slapped with a technical foul for hanging on the rim after a slam dunk. But Nedd missed the foul shot and Villanova ran its biggest lead of the half 24-13 with a Sparrow hoop at 9:36. UMass whittled the lead to five (36-31) but could not stop Sparrow who drove the basket with 4 seconds left and gave Villanova a seven-point lead at halftime.

Villanova Head Coach Rollie Massimino was very surprised after the game. "They (UMass) sure didn't play like a 1-17 ball club. They didn't quit. The three kids inside for them played well. We have to have good games from people like Alex (Bradley) and Rory (Sparrow) if we're going to play well and we did tonight."

Coach Ray Wilson commented about UMass' overall play, "We seemed to be in the game for a longer span of time but we began to make mistakes and turn the ball over."

The MInutemen will try once again to regroup tonight when they take on the Mountaineers of West Virginia in the Cage at 7:30. This is the same team that beat Vilanova 86-68 using a three guard offense headed by Lowes Moore. The senior guard is averaging 15.4 points a game.

Relay third at games Maine halts trackmen

The two mile relay team, sparked by a 1:54.6 split by tri-captain Steve MacDougall, placed an impressive third Friday night at the prestigious Millrose Games at Madison Square Garden. Saturday afternoon the trackmen lost a tough meet to the University of Maine 83-53, at Orono.

Senior tri-captain Mickey Baugh ran the leadoff leg for the relay team at 1:55.1. Farleigh Dickinson, the eventual winner of the race, broke out and maintained an early lead. They were followed by William and Mary who finished second. MacDougall ran the next leg and was followed by Rick Walls, whose 1:55.5 represented his best time in the half for this year. Running the anchor leg was sophomore Paul Beaulieu at 1:56.3. The final time for the Minutemen was 7:42.5.

The next day in Maine UMass had some strong performances on the afternoon.

Freshman Stephen Hyder won the shotput with a throw of 46 feet 1 inch. Kirk Sinner placed third in the shot with 42.6. Hyder also finished second in the 35 pound weight with 42.5 and a quarter.

"This was the best performance of the year for the weight team" UMass Coach Ken O'Brien said.

Jim Larajee won the pole vault with a vault of 13' 6". Sophomore Jay Buckley captured third with 12' 0. In the long jump it was a second and third finishes for Minutemen Geoff Durant and Bill Devarney.

UMass swept the mile race with John Caffrey winning with a time of 4:18.6 followed by Jay Legere and Danny Fitch. It was the only event on the afternoon in which the Minutemen captured all three spots. In this point in the meet UMass led over Maine 28-17.

John Wright and John Rasku captured the second and third spots in the 60 yard high hurdles with times of 7.7 and 7.8 respectively. UMass was shut out of both the triple jump and the high jump and that gave Maine the lead that would not relinquish 45-36.

Despite injuries juniors Rick Cady and tri-captain Rick Trunfio finished second and third in the 440 with times of 50.7. Bob Pearson salvaged second in the 660 at 1:13.8 and DeVarney ran a 6.5 to get second in the dash, one tenth of a second slower than Maine freshman Kevin Tarr, whose 6.4 set a new meet record.

UMass again placed second and third this time in the 100 with Tom Lawrence, 2:20, and Paul Kirksay, 2:21.4. An impressive performance by sophomore Kevin Corcoran capped the two mile run. Corcoran's winning time was 9:08.5. Freshman Rick Doiron turned in another fine performance placing third at 9:16.5.

Both the mile and two realy teams were beaten by Maine.

"I thought we'd outscore then by a lot more than we did," O'Brien said. "This is definitely one of the better Maine teams that we've seen. I thought the sprints and hurdlers looked strong. The distance kids did a good job. We were a shade weak in the long jump and the middle distance team was not as strong as it has been."

February is Black History Month

FOR WHOM THE GUNS TOLL

By Tony Crayton

The February 9th New York Times reported that Carter (the"acting"President) has petitioned Congress to approve registration of 18-20 year olds in this country for the armed services. He stated that it was to increase "preparedness and further demonstrate our resolve as a nation...to maintain peace and to prevent conflict..." Incidently, unless they change the law, which is doubtful, failure to register carries a penalty of 5 years or $10,000 fine or both.

I will not go into the issue of why the draft and who you are expected to kill. First I would like black students to note why some of our people will ardently oppose it. There are certain historical considerations to observe on this question and while it is Black History Month; here are presented some of those historical considerations.

Everytime America has called blacks to war, we answered with our blood. When America fought it's revolutionary war it was a black man, Crispus Attucks, who was the first to shed blood against the British. 5,000 blacks answered the call then. They fought in Lexington, Concord, Bunker Hill, Ticonderoga and in every major battle to declare America free. From it's inception, however, this war of independence was immersed in contradictions of conscience.

The continental army barred blacks from entry and maintained that position until they were taking a severe beating and the British were offering freedom to blacks if they fought for them. America put 5,000 black lives on the battle lines to be cannon fodder for white America's freedom, yet we remained as slaves. Later we were declared 3/5 of a human being(by the Missouri Compromise). They hunted us like animals and shot us down as beasts, we were sold as property treated as property and disposed of as property. When white America became free they wrote a constitution that guaranteed us 100 years of slavery in exchange for defeat of the British.

In 1815 the British landed an invasion force in New Orleans led by a General Pakenham. Andrew Jackson, then president of the United States, made a special appeal to the blacks of New Orleans for help and we answered by sending two combat batallions. After a two-hour battle the British were defeated and the blacks were still slaves.

When the Civil War broke out everyone thought it was to end slavery; and that is true. But the war was not on moral grounds but economic. There were too many whites without jobs because of black free labor. Although we fought to end slavery, it was merely substituted with peonage, poverty and the Ku Klux Klan.

For World War One we answered the call with 100,000 soldiers in 1917. This time we did not go die for our former slave masters without protest. 15,000 blacks marched in New York City to protest the extreme numbers of lynchings and racist attacks throughout the country. One placard read: Mr. President, why not make America safe for Democracy?

World War Two came up and America sent blacks against Hitler and Tojo in racially segregated units. Again America claimed to be warring to "make the world safe for democracy." When we came back we had no voting rights; we had lynchings, discrimination and all of the trappings that mad America what it still is today.

One of the most outrageous crimes that occurred in America after WWII happened on April 1st 1950. The war might well have been lost had not Dr. Charles Drew developedthe blood bank system Yet, on that April day, having gotten into a car accident and suffering profuse bleeding, he died for lack of blood. The very person, a black man, who saved thousands of lives by the development of blood plasma and the blood bank system, died because the hospital was for whites only.

Given a history such as that, many blacks in the late sixties, when asked to fight in Vietnam (against people who did nothing against America), answered that it was for white folks only. It was their war. Yet still many of us did go.

We made up 12% of the armed forces yet were 39% of the casualties. And while the guns were blazing the skies of Vietnam all was not quiet on the Western front,America.

Blacks, protesting the racism and discrimination in America, were being murdered with chilling frequency. Bombings became an almost daily occurance. They bombed homes, businesses and even the churches-like the 16th street Baptist Church in Birmingham. Denice McNair, eleven years old; Cynthia Wesley, fourteen years old; Addie Mae Collins, fourteen; and Carol Robertson, fourteen, all died as a result of a bomb blast at their church while they prayed. Virgil Wade, thirteen and Johnnie Robinson sixteen were also murdered that day.

Fred Hampton, Malcolm X, Martin Luther King, George Jackson, Medgar Evers and Mark Clark are all dead. AND ... America wants our youth to die or kill again in a foreign land.

The Martin Luther King holiday failed to pass the Congress for lack of funds. While two white men stalk and kill a black man because they could not find a cow or deer to shoot and the prosecutor grants them a guarantee of no death penalty even though they plead guilty. [Oh, excuse me, maybe you did not hear about that. See the Boston Herald February 7, 1980 front page.]

The crimes that go on each year in this country against blacks are so pervasive as to easily fit the words of Frederick Douglass who said that they (crimes) were enough to "disgrace a nation of savages."

Dr. Yosef Ben-Yochannon to Speak at C.C. TONIGHT

When Harlem Preparatory School finally closed its doors recently, it ended what Dr. YOSEF BEN YOCHANNAN considered to be "the highlight of my teaching career." Dr. BEN YOCHANNAN, as director of Harlem Prep's Department of African, Caribbean and African American Studies, was a member of an independent inner-city school whose entrance requirements were limited to high school dropouts and whose curriculum was completed only when the student was accepted by a college or university. In its first three years, Harlem Prep gained college admissions for 110 of its students. At the same time it counted no failures and no dropouts. But, while financial difficulties at Harlem Prep eventually ended on of America's most noble educational experiments, Dr. BEN YOCHANNAN merely stepped up his already furious pace, researching and writing on the cultural history of black Africa.

An Ethiopian Jew with impressive academic credentials, YOSEF BEN-YOCHANNAN's name is now displayed on more than a dozen volumes, as author or co-author, of African and Caribbean cultural history. Fluent in Spanish, Portuguese, Hebrew, Americ, Swahili, Italian, Gheeze and English, he was born in Ethiopia, raised in the Virgin Islands and studied in Africa, England and the US.

Dr. BEN-YOCHANNAN, NOW TEACHING HISTORY AND RELIGION AT THREE New York area colleges, has lectured extensively on African history and social cultural history, served as senior cultural anthropologist and specialist on East Africa for UNESCO, and advised the Ambassador from Zanzibar in African history and related affairs. His most recent publication is Black Man of the Nile. Other works include authorship of Africa (Alkebu-Lan) in History: A Chronology: 1,750,000 BCE - 1966 CE (seven volumes); Africa Origins of the Major "Western Religions"; Africa: Mother of "Western Civilization"; and a number of other works now being readied for publication. In addition, he is co-author of some five other works on African, Caribbean and African American cultural history. Most recently he helped found the Black Studies Program at Shaw University in Raleigh, North Carolina
